

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE—NOTE-TAKING IN THE MEMBERS' SIDE-GALLERY—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That any Report or Record of the Proceedings of this House, or of a Committee of the whole House, made, taken, or kept by officials of this House as an official act or otherwise without the previous order or sanction or knowledge of the House, and for purposes not revealed to the House, other than the Notes or Minutes of the Orders and Proceedings of the House, or of the Committee of the whole House, taken at the Table by the Clerk or the Clerk Assistant, is without precedent in the customs and usages of Parliament,"—(Mr. Parnell) 164

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "Notice having been taken, while the House was in Committee, of the presence in one of the side Galleries of a gentleman engaged in taking notes of the proceedings of the Committee; and Mr. Speaker having informed the House that the gentleman was an officer of the House, and was so employed under his direction, and that the notes taken by him were for the confidential information of the Speaker, this House is of opinion that Mr. Speaker was justified in the directions given by him, and is entitled to the support and confidence of this House,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,)—instead thereof.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE—NOTE-TAKING IN THE MEMBERS' SIDE-GALLERY—RESOLUTION—

Proceedings of the House further resumed.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'Notice having been taken, while the House was in Committee, of the presence in one of the side Galleries of a gentleman engaged in taking notes of the proceedings of the Committee; and Mr. Speaker having informed the House that the gentleman was an officer of the House, and was so employed under his direction, and that the notes taken by him were for the confidential information of the Speaker, this House is of opinion that Mr. Speaker was justified in the directions given by him, and is entitled to the support and confidence of this House,' be added, instead thereof" 228

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out from the words "this House," in line 7 of the proposed Amendment, to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "declares that the practice of this House prescribes that the Clerk Assistant do not take any notes here without the precedent directions and commands of the House, but only of the Orders and Reports made in the House, and that the entry of the Clerk of particular men's speeches was without warrant at all times,"—(Mr. Gray,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment:"—After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 292, Noes 24; Majority 268.—(Div. List, No. 160.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

MALTA (COST OF POLICE, &c.)—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, the cost of maintaining the Police, and of draining, repairing, lighting, cleaning, and watering the streets, &c. in Malta, should be paid out of a rate upon house and other property (upon which, at present, no rates or taxes of any kind whatever are levied), and not, inter alia, out of a tax upon wheat and other grain for food, and upon potatoes and other vegetables, which, as a matter of fact, actually takes more per head from the very poor who live in cellars than it takes per head from those who live in the best houses in the streets and squares; and the House is therefore further of opinion that it is the duty of Her Majesty’s Government to take such steps as may be necessary to secure the abolition of the taxes on food in Malta on and from the 1st day of January 1881,”—(Mr. Plimsoll.)—instead thereof 1898

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 120, Noes 62; Majority 58.—(Div. List, No. 201.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."—(The Earl Stanhope.)

VOL. CCXLVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY
rose to move that the House resolve itself into Committee that day three months; and said, that, although his noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition in that House had taken a Division on the second reading of this Bill, he had thought it right to give Notice of his intention to take the sense of the House on the measure a second time, because, in the debate on the second reading, their Lordships were not favoured with the opinion of the Government. He hoped they would now hear that opinion, and especially the opinion of the Local Government Board. The Bill was not a very important one; but it was not one that ought to pass without its provisions being thoroughly understood. It was extremely short. The operative clause was in these terms—

"The provisions of the principal Act, as to a place for the reception of the dead before interment, in the principal Act called a mortuary, shall extend to a place for the interment of the dead, in this Act called a cemetery; and the purposes of the principal Act shall include the acquisition, construction, and maintenance of a cemetery. A local authority may acquire, construct, and maintain a cemetery, either wholly or partly, within or without, their district, subject as to works without their district for the purpose of a cemetery to the provisions of the principal Act as to sewage works by a local authority without their district. A local authority may accept a donation of land for the purpose of a cemetery, and a donation of money or other property for enabling them to acquire, construct, or maintain a cemetery."

The Public Health Act of 1875 provided for the supply by the local authority of a mortuary for the reception of dead bodies; this Bill extended that provision to cemeteries, and being construed with the 141st clause of the principal Act, enacted that the local authority might, and when required by the Local Government Board should, provide a cemetery. If the Bill became law, there would be three classes of burial places—the churchyards, the cemeteries provided by the Burial Boards, and the cemeteries to be established under this Act. The sanitary authority, which might be the Board of Guardians, would be enabled to provide cemeteries at the expense of the ratepayers and subject to none of the provisions of the Burial Acts. It might provide an entirely consecrated burial ground or an entirely unconsecrated one. The Bill, so far from remedying, would, in his judgment, aggravate the evils that at present existed in connection with the Burial Laws. It was an insidious Bill, for under the guise of an apparently simple clause in this short Bill the whole Burial Law of the country would be altered. Though a Poor Law Guardian himself, he ventured to think that the machinery of a Board of Guardians was not the best one for such a purpose as that. Many persons thought that this was an injudicious Bill, and one calculated to increase the grievance of which the Dissenters now complained. The Nonconformists claimed to have their dead buried in churchyards in such a manner as should not violate their consciences; and they were offered cemeteries in substitution for churchyards, to be provided at the expense of the ratepayers. He was certain that no contrivance of the kind would be satisfactory to the Nonconformist bodies. The noble Earl concluded by moving that the House do resolve itself into a Committee on the Bill that day three months.

The Earl of Kimberley

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months.")—

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that this Bill, like all the Burial Acts which had ever been passed, had been introduced on grounds of public health. Up to this time, under the operation of the previous Acts, some thousands of burial grounds had been closed, and from 3,000 to 4,000 cemeteries opened. This Bill was introduced into the House of Commons in December last, and passed a second reading and went through Committee without opposition. On the third reading, a Motion was made for its rejection by the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), who seemed to have a vested interest in the burial question; but the vote which carried the third reading was not a Party one, for the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), and others of his Friends, voted against him. The Bill was a well-considered one. The noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) appeared to think it was not necessary; but he would ask whether any noble Lord opposite who had filled the Office of Home Secretary had ever arrived at any definite understanding of the Burial Acts? It was true that under the existing Acts the Burial Boards were compelled to have unconsecrated burial ground; and there could be no doubt that the Local Government Board, who had control over the sanitary authorities in this matter, would give the fullest consideration to the wants of Nonconformists, and would never sanction a burial ground in which provision was not made for their wants. There was no existing Act to compel any district to have a burial ground, and at this moment the large town of Northampton was without a public one. Under the Bill, for the first time, where there was a local authority, and the Local Government Board ordered the closing of a burial ground as dangerous to public health, the Board could compel it to establish a cemetery. From his own experience at the Home Office, he did not think the Home Secretary was called on to perform any more painful duty than that of deciding on the application of persons to have interments made in the family graves of closed cemeteries. He hoped that the question of passing this Bill would not be made one between Churchmen and Dissenters — that no such attempt would be made to amplify a little measure; but that their Lordships would agree to the Bill as one which was required to meet a necessity of the public health.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY asked, where was the clause in the Bill which gave the Local Government Board a controlling power in the matter?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that it would be found in the Acts incorporated with the Bill.

LORD ABERDARE said, the contention on his side of the House was that no provisions for the equal burial of Churchmen and Dissenters were to be found in the Bill. If he were only convinced that both sides would receive equal advantages, he would support the Bill. Then the manner in which the Bill had been brought forward looked very like legislation by surprise, and its very title was misleading. There were many things included in the measure which had nothing to do with public health. He denied, also, the statement of the noble Viscount that all the Burial Acts which had been passed had been passed in the interests of public health. Surely a measure proposing so important an alteration in the existing law should not be sanctioned until it was thoroughly understood, especially as it was proposed to take money from the local rates. So far from this, however, eminent Nonconformists, including Members of the other House of Parliament, now expressed their astonishment at the Bill, which had not been looked into, and was not understood by them, before it passed the House of Commons. Under the Cemeteries Act, which was to be incorporated with this Bill, no provision was made for equality as regarded Church and Dissent; for if the Bishop of the diocese called on the local authorities to provide a cemetery and chapel they were compelled to do so; whereas, in all other cases, it was provided that they "may," if they think fit. He asked the right rev. Prelate opposite (the Bishop of Peterborough) whether, under the existing law, there was not equality, as a portion of the cemeteries now established must be consecrated?

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH said, he would not trouble their Lordships by entering into a discussion of the principles of the Bill; but the challenge just thrown out to him by his noble Friend was one which he could not pass by. His noble Friend appealed to him as to the correctness of his statement that under the existing Cemeteries Act there was perfect equality, inasmuch as private companies formed under that Act could be compelled by the Bishop to set apart a certain portion of the ground in their cemeteries for consecration at his hands. He could furnish a fact that was conclusive against that proposition. In Northampton, which was within his own diocese, and where for years all the parish grave-yards had been closed by Act of Parliament, there existed no public cemetery, but the cemetery in the hands of a private company. That private company, the majority of which were Dissenters, had not only not been compelled to have a portion of their ground consecrated, but they had repeatedly refused to do so; and at that moment Churchmen in Northampton were by his open connivance interred in unconsecrated ground with the service of the Church. He thought there ought to be equality towards all. For himself, he would be perfectly content to see a cemetery no portion of which was consecrated, and in which all might be buried without distinction, with their own forms. He mentioned that to show that it was in no illiberal spirit he expressed his opinion that the existing law did not do justice to Churchmen who desired to have consecrated ground.

LORD SELBORNE said, that under this Bill every Town Council, without any control, and Board of Guardians throughout the country, subject to a certain limited control; could do the very same thing, either in favour of the Church or against the Church, as had been done at Northampton. Under the existing Burials Acts, when a new cemetery was established, it must be done on equal terms as between Churchmen and Dissenters; but under this Bill the local authorities would have the power of establishing out of the rates — that was, by public taxation, purely sectarian burial grounds; so that, instead of removing or mitigating any existing sense of grievance, the Bill would merely in-introduce a new element of discord. If they wanted to enlarge or alter the powers of the Burials Acts, let them do so; but he deprecated their going back, from the policy of the Burials Acts, to the imperfect policy of earlier Acts, enabling companies to make cemeteries throughout the country; because, if they reverted to such a policy, sectarian questions would arise under colour of a Bill professedly intended for the purposes of public health. And to enable this to be done out of rates was quite a new thing in public legislation; it was, in fact, to reverse the policy of the Church Rates Abolition Act.

LORD NORTON said, that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Aberdare) had forgotten the Acts later than the only one he cited; which, in acknowledgment of the failure of the attempt to insist on posthumous schism in grave-yards, and of the enactment that there should always be unconsecrated as well as consecrated ground in every cemetery, and chapels for each, had provided that there might be either the one or other, or both, just as any locality desired. The principle of these later Acts was the principle of this Bill. The noble and learned Lord who had just spoken made the same mistake; and the Northampton case only showed the necessity of some authority being made to act, where no one was inclined to make requisite provision for burials at all. He, however, supported the Bill on sanitary grounds. It was distinctly a sanitary measure, and the first attempt to carry into full effect the recommendations of the Sanitary Commission over which he had presided for two years to make it part of the duties of local authorities to provide proper interment of the dead. He must point out that this Bill would only enact in respect of cemeteries what was already law in the case of mortuaries.

EARL COWPER observed, that the fact that this Bill had passed through the House of Commons without discussion, except upon its third reading, was hardly surprising, inasmuch as some Bills were considered in the other House at such enormous length, and with such copiousness, that hon. Members got sick and passed other measures through the Forms of the House at a late hour of the night hurriedly, without giving them sufficient consideration. This, it was said, was merely a sanitary measure; but the only reason given for placing it under that description was that the power was lodged in the local sanitary authorities. For his own part, he objected to any increased power in this matter being given to the sanitary authorities in the rural districts, for their action had certainly not rendered it advisable to increase their power in any way. The default of those bodies he regarded as a fundamental one, due to their constitution—namely, that under their constitution taxation and representation did not go together. Under this Bill, the sanitary authorities would have power to establish cemeteries consisting wholly of consecrated ground; and after the decision which that House had come to two years ago, that all churchyards in the country should be open to all religious bodies, provided their funerals were conducted in a Christian and orderly manner, their Lordships would be stultifying themselves if they gave authority to any bodies to establish cemeteries in which restrictions were imposed upon burials. He hoped that the House would divide, and that the result of the hurried Division of the other night would be reversed.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 117; Not-Contents 69: Majority 48.

THE ROYAL HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTIONS.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that Her Majesty Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 proposed in the year 1860 to let a portion of the ground purchased by them at South Kensington to the Royal Horticultural Society, who were to form the Gardens there ; and, by certain agreements between the two Corporations the Society was authorized to borrow £50,000 on debentures, and the Commissioners engaged to expend £50,000 in forming earthworks and building the arcades. The Society not only spent the whole of the £50,000 raised upon their debentures, but also a large sum of money—£25,000—received for life-fellowships in building the conservatory and forming the Gardens. The interest on the debenture debt was made payable out of the receipts from the Gardens, as defined by the original agreement, after paying all necessary expenses ; and after payment of such interest the balance up to £2,400 was to be paid to the Commissioners as interest on their outlay by way of rent. The receipts of the Gardens, in spite of the most rigid economy, had unfortunately not been sufficient of late years to pay the debenture interest; and in March last Her Majesty's Commissioners, alleging a right of re-entry, commenced a suit in Chancery to recover possession of the Gardens without compensation to anyone—the effect of which suit, if successful, would be to destroy the security of the debenture-holders and the rights of life-fellows. He wished, therefore, to ask the Lord President the following Questions:—Whether it was true that Her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 had commenced a suit in Chancery against the Royal Horticultural Society in order to recover possession of the Gardens at South Kensington, now in the occupation of the Society; whether it was the fact that this proceeding, if carried into effect, would extinguish the liability of Her Majesty's Commissioners to pay the holders of the Horticultural Society's debentures ten shillings in the pound in 1892, provided Her Majesty's Commissioners should, at that date, decline to renew the Society's lease; and, whether, if the facts were as stated, Her Majesty's Commissioners proposed to make any compensation to the debenture-holders for the security now held by them, which it was thus proposed to extinguish?

EARL GRANVILLE said, the Lord President had requested him to answer the Questions of the noble Viscount, as he was one of the Commissioners of 1851. It was true that such a suit had been commenced. But with regard to the other matters included in the Question, he had to state that the Commissioners never had been, were not, and never could be under any liability to pay the debentures of the Royal Horticultural Society, and that, this being so, they did not propose to make any compensation to the debenture-holders.

QUESTIONS.

EXHIBITION COMMISSIONERS, 1851, &c.
THE ROYAL HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.—QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that Her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 have commenced a suit in Chancery against the Royal Horticultural Society, with the view of recovering possession of the Gardens at South Kensington now in the occupation of that Society; whether it is the fact that this proceeding, if carried into effect, would extinguish the liability of Her Majesty's Commissioners to pay the holders of the Horticultural Society's Debentures, ten shillings in the pound in 1892, provided Her Majesty's Commissioners should at that date decline to renew the Society's lease; and, whether, if the facts be as stated, Her Majesty's Commissioners propose to make any compensation to the Debenture Holders, for the security now held by them, which it is thus proposed to extinguish?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Commissioners have commenced an action in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice for the purpose of recovering possession of the Gardens at South Kensington, formerly agreed to be demised by them to the Royal Horticultural Society. The Commissioners never have been, and are not, and never can be, under any liability to pay the holders of the Royal Horticultural Society's debentures 10s. in the pound, or any other sum, because any possible liability to do so was contingent on the Society having performed the covenants in the agreements, which they have not done. Having regard to that fact, and to the fact that the debenture-holders have no lien or charge upon the property comprised in the agreements, the Commissioners, who hold their funds as trustees for the public, do not propose to make any compensation to those gentlemen.

PRISONS ACT, 1877—PRISON LABOUR.
QUESTION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware of the circumstances and conditions under which the Governor of Her Majesty's Prison at Maidstone is endeavouring to obtain orders for printing and bookbinding; whether this is done with the sanction and approval of Her Majesty's Government; and, whether it is part of a system which has been authorized in the prisons throughout the Country?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the authorities of Maidstone Prison might, for all he knew, be endeavouring to obtain orders for the kind of work referred to by the hon. Baronet in his Question. The practice in regard to prison work was to spread it over as many branches of labour as possible, so as not to press unduly on any particular industry of the country.

GENERAL PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT—SURGEONS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. BRUEN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Surgeons of Gaols in Ireland who were appointed by Boards of Superintendence, and who have performed the duties of their office before and since the 1st day of April 1878, are recognized by Her Majesty's Government as "Officers attached to Prisons" within the meaning of s. 27 of "The General Prisons (Ireland) Act, 1877;" whether surgeons not so appointed, but obliged as surgeons of infirmaries to perform medical duties in gaols, and who have performed them before and since the 1st day of April 1878, are so recognized; and, whether any salary will be paid to Prison Medical Officers for duties performed from the 1st day of April 1878 to the present time; and, if so, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a scale of the salaries to be paid for the performance of these duties?

MR. J. LOWTHER: My answer to all my hon. Friend's inquiries is in the affirmative; and, in addition to the table of salaries, I will lay upon the Table an explanatory document, which will make the matter clear.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether a Memorial was presented to the Irish Government from the Irish College of Physicians, protesting in the interests of the medical profession against the proposed amalgamation of the offices of surgeon and compounder in the Irish gaols; and, whether, in spite of this Memorial and of the strong feeling on the subject among the prison surgeons themselves, it is still intended to combine the two offices?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the Memorial referred to by the hon. Gentleman has been received. The intention, however, is not to make the amalgamation compulsory in the case of existing officers; but only in the cases of fresh appointments.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—INSPEC-TION OF EMIGRANT SHIPS.

QUESTION.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, with reference to the circular of July 1873, by which emigration officers, surveyors, and medical officers were directed under certain circumstances to inspect outward-bound vessels on Sundays so as to avoid the detention of those vessels, and extra fees for this extra work were ordered to be paid to the Mercantile Marine Fund by the owners of those vessels, On what ground the Board of Trade can justify the withholding from an emigration officer his share of those fees, long since paid to the Mercantile Marine Fund, for extra work done by him between August 1873 and February 1875?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The claim alluded to was raised some years ago, and disallowed by the Office. These fees for Sunday work were, I am informed, placed at a high rate, with the view of discouraging such demands upon the services of the officers, except in cases of necessity. No fees for overtime or for Sunday work have ever been paid by the Board of Trade to any salaried officer holding the position referred to by the Question. There are various salaried officers who have done Sunday work, and who are liable to have to do it in the future. None of these salaried officers have received the fees alluded to; and it appears to me impossible to make an exception in favour of one particular officer without giving up the general rule which has been hitherto adopted, and which we see no cause for abandoning.

ROYAL VICTORIA PATRIOTIC ASYLUM SCHOOLS, WANDSWORTH.

QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that upwards of £15,000 a-year are expended on the Schools of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum at Wandsworth under the administration of the Executive and Finance Committee of the Patriotic Fund; and, whether he will authorise an inquiry into the management and cost of these Schools by the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the expenditure of the Wellington College?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that, as far as he had been able to ascertain, about £15,000 a-year was expended on the schools referred to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He was informed that the managing body had taken steps already, by the appointment of a committee, to make a very searching inquiry into this expenditure; that the committee had reported, and had made recommendations which would probably lead to a very material diminution of the expenditure. He did not consider it desirable to authorize an inquiry into the management and cost of these schools by the Royal Commission of the Wellington College.

ARMY — THE AUXILIARY FORCES — VOLUNTEERS UNDER CANVAS.

QUESTION.

MR. LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, considering the inconvenience to Volunteer companies about to go under canvas which arises from want of information regarding the amount of the Government grant, he will be good enough to say whether the grant this year will be two shillings per man per day, or only two shillings and sixpence per man for the whole period of camp service?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, he was sorry to say that he had to give the same answer that he had given a few days ago—namely, that he could not make any definite statement at present. A draft regulation had been framed and submitted to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury; and his hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) had just informed him that the regulation had been approved.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, in connection with the fact that by letter, dated the 18th of June, in reply to a letter from the Corporation of Dublin, dated the 22nd of April, he informed the Corporation that the law advisers to the Crown in Ireland were of opinion that the Parliamentary and Municipal Elections Act of 1875 did not extend to Ireland, he is aware that serious confusion and doubts have arisen as to the procedure to be adopted in municipal elections in Ireland, and that the Corporation of Dublin are advised that they must, if this opinion of the law advisers be correct, revert to the procedure with regard to nominations prescribed by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1859, long since repealed as regards England; whether he is aware that a candidate has been nominated by a single burgess, and the nomination in pursuance of this advice accepted as valid, that no effective means appear to exist for testing the validity of nominations, that a candidate may nominate himself, that nominations and elections must take place so rapidly after the occurrence of a vacancy as to be a cause of public complaint, and to deprive the burgesses of reasonable opportunity of selection; and, whether he will take steps during the present Session to assimilate the procedure with reference to municipal and parliamentary elections and nominations in Ireland to that prescribed for England and Wales by the Act of 1875, or otherwise to remove the inconveniences which at present exist?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir; it is the case that the Law Officers have expressed the opinion that the Municipal Elections Act, 1875, does not apply to Ireland; but the hon. Gentleman is in error in alluding to that Act as the Parliamentary and Municipal Elections Act of 1875, since the Act in question was one passed by a private Member, and has no reference to Parliamentary elections. As to an assimilation of the law in Ireland to that prevailing in England, I should be prepared to introduce a short Bill with that object, provided that I had reason to think it would not lead to discussion and Amendments extending beyond the proposal for extending the English Act to Ireland. If, however, it is to give rise to any controversy, I should not feel justified in attempting to deal with the matter at all in the present state of Public Business.

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT—CASE OF PATRICK GRIMES.—QUESTIONS.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, considering the verdict of the jury in the case of Patrick Grimes, who died in Armagh Gaol on the 13th ult. that, though the treatment of the deceased in prison was humane and proper,

“Yet the new scale of diet and attendance to sick in hospital which has deprived prisoners of the new milk diet, and substituted a food not sufficient for the support of life, they highly condemn,” and, considering that this declaration was based on the evidence of Dr. Palmer, surgeon to the gaol, that the withdrawal of the new milk diet was a serious loss to the prisoners, and that is it intended to make any change in the dietary in Armagh Gaol and other prisons in Ireland where a similar scale is now enforced?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The scale of diet in force in gaols in Ireland is the same as that which was, after full inquiry before a Commission, adopted for English prisons. With reference to the particular case alluded to, I was astonished to find—and the House will be very much surprised to hear—that upon the Coroner's Jury there were impannelled six convicted prisoners actually undergoing their sentences in Armagh Gaol at the time. It is, therefore, scarcely to be wondered at that these persons availed themselves of the opportunity of making suggestions upon a subject in which they had so strong a personal interest. The attention of the parties responsible for the constitution of the Jury will be called to the impropriety of the course adopted in impannelling prisoners upon it, especially as, in addition to the manifest disadvantages attaching to such a proceeding, it happens to be in direct opposition to the express terms of an Act of Parliament; and measures will, therefore, be taken to prevent its recurrence.

MR. CALLAN: Sir, may I ask the Chief Secretary, whether his attention has been called to the evidence of a medical witness at that inquest?

MR. J. LOWTHER: No, Sir; my attention has not been called to that.

MR. CALLAN: Then I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I will ask a Question in reference to that subject.

COAL MINES — ACCIDENT AT THE CWM AVON COLLIERY.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to an accident which occurred at the Cwm Avon Colliery, South Wales, whereby six men were killed by the breaking of a wire rope, which was stated to have been at work for five years; whether it is true that the Inspector of Mines stated at the Coroner's Inquest that it ought to have been removed years ago, and that the engineer stated that he had frequently complained of the condition of the rope during the last two years, but no notice was taken of his complaints; and, what steps he has taken, if any, to punish the employer or agent who continued to use a rope of the character indicated by the engineer and the Government inspector?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, no doubt there had been gross carelessness and negligence in this case, and he had some days ago placed the paper in the hands of the Solicitor to the Treasury, in order to see what course should be taken.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACT—CONTINUANCE.—QUESTION.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, When he proposes to introduce the Bill dealing with the expiring Endowed Schools Act; and, for how many years he proposes to continue their operation?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, he was unable to state when the Bill would be introduced. It would be unadvisable to continue the expiring Acts for one year. He would endeavour to apportion the continuance of any new Act to the natural work it had to do.

BOARD OF CUSTOMS—THE SECRETARY. QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If any steps have been taken to fill up the vacant office of Secretary to the Board of Customs?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir; Mr. Smith, the assistant Secretary, will be appointed Secretary.

POOR LAW — PAUPER LUNATICS—CASE OF BENJAMIN HARRISON.

QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the inquest held on Tuesday last, on the body of Benjamin Harrison, at the South Yorkshire Pauper Lunatic Asylum, who, according to the verdict,

"Died seventeen days after his admission, from inflammation of the lungs, accelerated or caused by a fractured breastbone and three broken ribs, but as to where or when the injuries were inflicted there is not sufficient evidence to show;"

and, whether he will cause further inquiry to be instituted to ascertain by whom these injuries were inflicted?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, there was no doubt that the affairs of this Asylum ought to be thoroughly inquired into, and he had been in communication with the Earl of Shaftesbury and the Lunacy Commissioners on the subject. It was their intention to hold a personal inquiry into the subject; but, as several of the lunatics might have to be examined in their own rooms, it would be impossible to have a public inquiry.

The Lunacy Commissioners had declared that due notice should be given to all relations and friends of the deceased, well as to other persons interested, so that a solicitor would be allowed to watch the proceedings on their behalf. When the Report was made the Commissioners stated that they would have any objection whatever to make public; and if further inquiry should then be considered necessary, he (Mr. Assheton Cross) would take care that should take place.

ARMY—DESERTION AND FRAUDULENT ENLISTMENT.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government will direct the Departmental Committee of Officers, present investigating the system of enlistment in the regular Army, also to investigate the system of enlistment, discipline, and efficiency of the Militia, order to ascertain if some check can be placed on the desertion, fraudulent enlistment, and absence without leave which exhibit in the last two years respectively 10,000 men in a state of desertion; and 10 commissioned officers, 40 non-commissioned officers, and 15,000 private soldiers absent without leave, and, if not, what steps, if any, are under consideration to remedy this state of things; and, whether the Committee will be empowered to consider and report on the relations at present existing between the regular Army and the Militia, with a view of making the latter force a more certain and efficient reserve in times of emergency?

COLONEL STANLEY: The prime object of the Departmental Committee of Officers is to investigate the system of enlistment in the Regular Army in connection with other measures which are subsidiary thereto. The second part of the Question is, undoubtedly, under reference to the Committee; but the general question of the enlistment and discipline of the Militia I do not hold to be necessarily a part of that inquiry. Some of the officers who sit upon the Committee have come home on temporary leave from foreign stations, and it will be desirable that the Departmental Committee should conclude its inquiry within a reasonable time. As regards the question of the Militia, the of course, has not ceased to occupy our attention; but I am not able to say that it would be a distinct or separate subject to be referred to the Committee. Any steps to be taken to remedy the state of things with regard to desertion must follow the Report of the Committee, as that Report must materially affect the circumstances under which the Militia was enlisted.

POST OFFICE CONTRACTS—THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL COMPANY.

QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Postmaster General, In what proportion the annual loss, which has amounted to over £200,000 a-year upon the postal contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Company, has been shared between India and England respectively; whether any estimate has been made of the loss likely to result from the proposed new postal contract with the Company, and in what proportion this loss is to be shared between India and England; and, when this new contract will be submitted for the consideration of the House?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: In addition to the loss incurred by the Mother Country upon the Peninsular and Oriental Company's contract, estimated at over £200,000 a-year, the Government of India have had to bear a charge which has amounted to about £76,500 a-year on the average between 1868 and 1876. No estimate has been prepared of the loss likely to result from the proposed new postal contract with the Company; but it has been suggested that India should bear 23·84 per cent of the total cost to be incurred under that contract. I should wish to name a day when the contract will be brought under the notice of the House; but in the present state of Public Business I cannot do so. The Secretary to the Treasury will take the earliest opportunity of naming a day available for the purpose.

RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY.

QUESTION.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the case that the Oystermouth Railway, now the Swansea and Mumbles Railway, has been assessed by the Board of Inland Revenue to the Railway Passenger Duty; and, if not, if he would state on what grounds?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Yes, Sir; the railway in question is assessed to that duty.

CANAL BOATS ACT, 1877.

QUESTION.

MR. PRICE asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, Whether he is in a position to state what progress has been made by the different registering authorities under the Canal Boats Act of 1877 in registering canal boats; whether any Return has been called for as to the number of boats registered under the Act; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay it upon the Table of the House; and, if not, whether he will direct such a Return to be called for?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that a Question had been addressed to him in the early part of the Session as to the progress made in registering canal boats. He called for information, which had been supplied. It had been laid on the Table, and its substance would be in the hands of Members in a few days. He might state, however, that out of 99 districts registration had been effected in two-thirds. The number of boats registered was 5,000, with accommodation for 22,000 persons.

ARMY—THE 61ST AND 28TH REGIMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. PRICE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that repeated applications have been made to the Military authorities at home that, inasmuch as the 61st regiment was considerably under its proper establishment of subalterns, the vacancies might be supplied by the posting of supernumerary subalterns of the 28th regiment, its linked battalion, which was considerably in excess of its establishment of subalterns; whether it is true that at the time the 61st regiment was four subalterns below its establishment, and that in addition one subaltern was detailed on police duty at Cyprus without being seconded, one subaltern was superintendent of gymnasia at Malta, and consequently struck off duty, and one under orders to be transferred to a regiment in India; whether four officers were eventually transferred from the 28th to the 61st, and whether, at the same time that the transfer was notified, it was also notified that the four officers so transferred would still continue to do duty with the 28th; whether it is not a fact that the transfer has been made upon paper only; and, if he can state why the excess in the one regiment has not been utilised to supply the deficiency in the other linked battalion, especially as the 28th is serving in England and the 61st in the trying climate of Malta?

COLONEL STANLEY was understood to say that, owing to the proposal that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into Army organization, it was not required that the officers who were to be transferred from the 28th to the 61st Regiment should be transferred unless vacancies occurred in that corps meanwhile. From that answer it was plain that the transfer had been on paper only.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that, notwithstanding the representations made in the Debate on the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Bill in the House of Commons, and that the House might trust the Commissioners and the University to make such modifications in the terms of residence as should make the Universities more generally available, the Cambridge University Commissioners have, contrary to the wishes and recommendations of the Senate, proposed in the new statutes to fix the present terms of residence; and, whether he will communicate with the Commissioners on the subject?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he did not see how he could interfere with the free action of the Commissioners. He had, however, communicated with the Secretary to the Commission, who stated that no statutes had as yet been made by the Cambridge University Commissioners. It was true that it was proposed the former period of residence required for a degree—nine terms—should be continued; but the Commissioners had still under consideration the propriety of altering the exceptions to the rule.

PRINTING CONTRACT WITH MESSRS HANSARD.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether and what steps have been taken with regard to the contract with Messrs Hansard for printing for the House of Commons, and which will expire in the course of the present year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, there had been a good deal of correspondence between the Treasury, the Speaker, and Messrs Hansard, with regard to the contract for printing for the House of Commons in order to obtain a more favourable contract for the public; but the correspondence was still going on, and an arrangement had yet been concluded. The correspondence would be produced before any contract was signed.

THE TRANSVAAL PAPERS—"WHITE RUDOLPH."—QUESTION.

MR. COURTNEY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can arrange to publish, in the forthcoming Transvaal Papers, a Copy of the Judgment of Mr. Justice Kotzé, in the case of White v. Rudolph, delivered at Pretoria on the 17th of May?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that he had not received a Copy of the paper referred to; but would send for a Copy.

RAILWAYS—AUTOMATIC BRAKES QUESTIONS.

MR. J. COWEN (for Mr. J. W. B. CLAY) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he will procure a lay upon the Table of the House of Commons of a Report, dated April 24th 1879, Mr. T. E. Harrison, C.E., to the North Eastern Railway Company, on the Westinghouse Automatic Brake adopted on the North Eastern Railway; and whether the Board of Trade will be represented at the experiments with the brake proposed to be made near York by the North Eastern Railway Company on Monday next?

MR. MACDONALD also asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it was the custom of the Board to send representatives to witness experiments with other brakes that were candidates for public favour, especially as the Westinghouse brake was a foreign brake, and not one of home manufacture?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The North Eastern Railway Company have sent us a copy of the Report to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and if he will move for it, I shall be happy to lay it on the Table of the House. The Board of Trade will not be officially represented at the brake trials proposed to be held by the North Eastern Railway Company near York; but Mr. Farrer, the Secretary to the Board of Trade, and two of the inspecting officers of railways, have accepted invitations from the Railway Company to be present on the occasion. I need hardly add that, by their presence, no opinion is expressed, or intended to be expressed, as to the comparative merits of the brake which is the subject of the experiment; and that, in the present condition of this question, I should not think it right that the Board of Trade should show any preference whatever for any particular brake.

EGYPT—NUBAR PASHA.—QUESTIONS.

MR. OTWAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any information to the effect that Prince Tewfik, recently recommended by them as Khedive of Egypt, has forbidden Nubar Pasha to return to his country; whether there were any grounds for this arbitrary proceeding; and, whether Her Majesty's Representative in Cairo was cognizant of the order of banishment stated to have been issued by the Khedive? He might also ask when the further Papers promised with regard to Egypt would be ready?

MR. BOURKE: With regard to the first Question, no information has been received that Nubar Pasha has been forbidden to return to Egypt. With regard to the Papers, I can only tell my hon. Friend that the Papers are being prepared and will be produced before long.

MR. OTWAY inquired whether the Government had received any intimation from our Representative in Paris with regard to the matter?

MR. BOURKE replied in the negative. The Government had received no information of Nubar Pasha having been forbidden by anybody to return to his country.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will direct the Chief Commissioner of Police to make arrangements so as to enable Members of the House to attend the funeral of the Prince Imperial, which is to take place on Saturday next, the South-Eastern Railway having intimated their readiness to place a special train at the disposal of the Members who desire to attend?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I think that the hon. Member is mistaken as to the character of the funeral. It is to be entirely a private funeral, under the charge of the authorities at Camden House, and the Government have no power to interfere. All I can say is that if a special train goes to take Members of Parliament, no doubt the First Commissioner of Police will take care that every attention is paid to them, and that they are not crowded and inconvenienced so far as he is concerned.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—FLOGGING.—QUESTIONS.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK wished to ask the Secretary of State for War a Question of which he had given him private Notice. It was, Whether it had escaped his observation that under the arrangements contained in the Paper circulated the day before flogging could not henceforth be inflicted for the crime of drunkenness on duty under arms in the immediate presence of the enemy; whether it was intended to retain corporal punishment as a deterrent for the commission of this crime; and, if not, whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would consider the advisability of abolishing flogging altogether, it being desirable to relieve the Army from the stigma of being the only Army in Europe? —["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that the Question was of a controversial character, involving matter of argument, and could not, therefore, be put.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that as there were only a few words more, he might be permitted to finish his Question. ["Order!" "No, no!"] The hon. and gallant Member gave Notice that he would put the Question, with such modifications as the Speaker, in his discretion, might point out.

GRAND JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.
QUESTION.

MR. D. TAYLOR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If (considering the lateness of the Session and the state of Public Business) it is his intention to proceed any further with the Grand Juries (Ireland) Bill?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I confess, Sir, that the present condition of Public Business does not make me very hopeful as to the passage of this Bill. It will, doubtless, shortly be necessary for the Government to make an announcement as to what Bills we shall be able to proceed with; and, meanwhile, I will confer with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House as to the position of this Bill.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked, If the Banking and Joint Stock Companies Bill would be taken to-night?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No.

MR. BENTINCK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he would have the goodness to state what Business would be taken next week?

MR. DILLWYN: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question of which I have given him private Notice. A paragraph has appeared in two of the morning papers to the effect that arrangements have been made to carry on a continuous Sitting of the House until the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill has been passed through Committee—a continuous Sitting; and I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has made, or is cognizant of, any such arrangement?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have not seen the paragraph to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and I am not cognizant of any such arrangement. What we hope is this—In one sense, we must have a continuous series of Sittings on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, because it is now so near the time at which the temporary Act expires that we must postpone all other Business in order to proceed with the Bill. That makes it difficult to answer the Question with great positiveness, because if we are not finished by Monday we shall be obliged to go on with it. I hope the House, in consideration of the state of Business and the period of the Session, will assist us to make serious progress with this Bill this evening, and, in that case, I hope we may be able to complete the Committee to-morrow at the Morning Sitting. We do not propose to ask for a Sitting on Saturday. If, on Monday, we shall have completed the Committee on the Bill, we shall propose to take the Estimates—the Civil Service Estimates—and probably some of the Irish Estimates on that day. Last year, on the 15th of July, we made the request, customary at the end of the Session, that Government Business should take precedence on Tuesdays and Wednesdays; and I propose on Monday, at the meeting of the House, to make a similar proposal. It will be the same day of the year as the proposal was made last year; and, certainly, the Business this year is not at all further advanced than it was last year. I trust the House will be willing to entertain that proposal. I do not ask the House to express any opinion on it at the present time. I only give Notice that I will make the Motion on Monday.

MR. BENTINCK asked, What other Estimates than these already mentioned would be taken next week?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am afraid I am hardly in a position to say what other Estimates will be taken. If, however, my hon. Friend refers to the Navy Estimates, I may tell him that we do not propose to take them next week.

MR. GOSCHEN said, progress had been made with the Civil Service and the Army Estimates; but only one night had been devoted to the Navy Estimates, which he never remembered to have been dealt with as they had been this year. Why was it impossible to proceed with them?

MR. W. H. SMITH exceedingly regretted that it had fallen to his lot to be later than usual with the Navy Estimates; but it was not his fault that they had not been proceeded with. The ground for proceeding with the Civil Service Estimates next week was that there was an actual want of money on account of the Votes to be proposed. Therefore, there was no alternative but to go on with them. As soon as he could get the opportunity, he should only be too glad to bring on the Navy Estimates.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wish to ask the Government, Whether it is to be distinctly understood that the report which has appeared in all the newspapers as to a continuous Sitting to-night is not correct? Of course, that statement has not been made officially, and I presume that the House will not sit beyond 12 or 1 o'clock?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I stated that I was not cognizant of any such arrangement as that referred to. As to the particular hour to which we should sit to-night, that is a matter for the convenience and the discretion of the House itself. I hope we shall be able to make good progress with the Bill.

MR. HIBBERT asked, Whether the Valuation Bill would be taken at the Morning Sitting next Tuesday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I would rather not say.

MR. CALLAN would address the Question of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) to the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston), since he was understood to have identified himself with such arrangements, and would ask, Whether it had been arranged that the House was to be kept by relays of Members throughout the night?

[No answer was given to the Question.]

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—CORPORAL PUNISHMENT— THE SCHEDULE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. SULLIVAN asked, with reference to the Schedule which had been issued as to persons liable to be flogged for certain special offences, Whether it was intended that every person committing any of those offences, and therefore liable to death, should be flogged, whether he were an officer or not?

COLONEL STANLEY explained that the Paper referred to was a mere Memorandum which he had promised the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) he would lay upon the Table to show the offences referred to in the Schedule which the Government intended to propose.

MR. SULLIVAN asked, Was it to be understood that the offences specified would be so punished?

COLONEL STANLEY said, they would be governed by the clause.

MR. SULLIVAN gave Notice that on the clause referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman he would move such Amendments as would secure that where an offence liable to be punished by death was committed there should be no distinction made as regarded the infliction of flogging between an officer and a private soldier.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 8th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART V.

APPLICATION OF MILITARY LAW, SAVING PROVISIONS, AND DEFINITIONS.

Persons subject to Military Law.

Clause 166 (Persons subject to military law as officers).

COLONEL STANLEY said, that several Amendments appeared upon this clause, the general effect of which was to preclude half-pay officers from the operation of the Act. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that when he brought in the Bill he stated that he believed the law in reference to half-pay officers had never been brought into operation. He found there was considerable objection to bringing officers upon half-pay under this Act; and he, therefore, proposed to leave out the words from "full pay," in line 37, page 91, to the end of line 2, page 92, and to insert—

"And if not otherwise subject to military law, officers on the staff of the army, and officers employed in military service under the orders of an officer of the regular forces."

He thought that would cover the case of all officers who ought to be made amenable to discipline.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he had the first Amendment upon the Paper; but the statement just made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was entirely satisfactory to him, because it conceded the principle he had intended to call attention to—namely, that, in future, no officer upon half-pay should be subject to military law. As the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had conceded the point, he would not take up the time of the Committee by arguing it further, more especially as he spoke upon it at considerable length on the second reading of the Bill.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN did not rise to speak to the Amendment, but merely to ask a question of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He was anxious to know whether he would undertake, after the Sitting that night, to have the Bill reprinted as far as it had been got through the Committee. Amendments had been proposed and accepted upon every clause; and it was a difficult matter to ascertain how the Bill now stood. It would be a great convenience to the Committee if, unless the sanguine hope of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that they would get through the Bill that night were realized, the Bill could be reprinted, showing the Amendments which had hitherto been adopted.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had no objection to place a copy of the Bill, as amended up to the present, in the Vote Office; but he did not think he could undertake to have the Bill reprinted.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked, if there would only be one copy, or would the Bill be printed and distributed to Members?

COLONEL STANLEY could not guarantee to have it distributed to Members; but he would place one or two amended copies in the Vote Office for reference by Members.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked for a little explanation respecting a subsequent section of the clause they were now discussing. On page 92, the 4th sub-section was as follows:—

From that Proviso it would appear that the Legislature of a Colony might pass an Act including in its provisions corporal punishment, and that in that case the provisions of the Imperial Act would not apply. He did not quite understand why the Legislature of a Colony should be allowed to override the provisions of an Imperial Act in relation to persons serving Her Majesty under military orders.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if the hon. Gentleman proposed to leave out the sub-section?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes.

COLONEL STANLEY said, it had been understood that the Legislature of a Colony almost always followed, in effect, the Imperial law. A right hon. Gentleman opposite had stated that, in his great experience, he had found that Colonial legislation, in all matters, was very similar to that of the Mother Country.

MR. E. JENKINS said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not quite understood the point raised. If he would turn his attention to the clause, he would find it there stated that—

and then it went on to say—

That was to say, that an officer so serving would be under the Imperial Act; but the Imperial Act reserved to the Colony, which raised and paid Forces, the right of legislating with regard to the discipline of those Forces. He hoped his hon. Friend would be satisfied with the explanation given, and would withdraw his opposition.

MR. O'DONNELL was not quite clear as to the bearing of the clause, as it now stood, after the explanation just offered. He thought it would be desirable that in the case of Colonial troops or Colonial officers, serving in an Imperial Army, and under Imperial command, and for Imperial purposes, should be subjected to the same common and general discipline that was maintained for the Imperial Forces. He took it that when a war arose in one of our Colonies, and was of such a character as to require the interposition of the Imperial Forces, then, in consideration of the Imperial assistance extended to that Colony, the least we could require from the Colony was that all the Colonial Forces serving under our command should be absolutely subject to the general provisions of our Imperial Discipline Acts. This was a matter of the first importance; for if we were conducting an Imperial war for the defence of one of our Colonies, it was quite intolerable that that Colony, or any portion of it, should have power to conduct the war according to conditions prohibited to the Imperial Forces. He would venture to give an instance. In The Standard newspaper of yesterday it was reported by a correspondent, in relation to the recent surprise of the Colonial Forces by the Basutos, that after the defeat the Colonial Forces in the morning rallied, and went out to discover the Basutos; but none of the enemy could be found, except two wounded men, who, the correspondent wrote, "were forthwith shot." The correspondent proceeded to say—

"It is to be hoped that these wounded Basutos were only shot for resistance to capture; but, I must admit, the Colonial opinion would fully justify the knocking on the head and shooting of wounded natives without more ado."

Well, now, the discipline of the British Army did not, and could not, tolerate the assassination of wounded enemies; therefore, were they to allow an exception to be introduced between the Imperial and Colonial Forces, by which the latter, whom they were protecting and assisting against an enemy, who would otherwise overpower them, should practice acts of atrocity of that description, which would not be tolerated, and could not be tolerated, within the scope of the Imperial authority? He thought that they ought to insist, that where the Colonies asked for our assistance, in cases where the Colonial Forces required to be aided by the Imperial Forces, so long as we were aiding them—so long as we were holding the ægis of Imperial power over them—we ought to insist that they should do nothing which should disgrace the Imperial name. He thought hon. and gallant Gentlemen opposite would recognize that if Colonies could raise troops and volunteers of all descriptions, and could refuse to submit to the authority of the Imperial Discipline Acts, that, then, the door was opened to the very gravest abuse. He could give two other instances directly bearing on the point. He would not be in Order in referring explicitly to a Question addressed to the Secretary of State for War, and to the answer given; but he could put the case hypothetically. A Member of the House, on inquiring from the Secretary of State for War as to the use of dynamite, and some other forbidden engines of war, in a Colonial war, received for an answer—

"That such Colonial officers using these forbidden engines of war are in no way under the control of the Imperial Government."

Why, there at once a serious difficulty was presented. In the one common Imperial enterprize we could have one portion of the Forces bound by Imperial Discipline Acts, and another portion of the Forces feeling themselves at liberty to have recourse to methods of warfare discarded by this country. They ought to render it impossible for any Force—Colonial or otherwise, when engaged in the same field of war—to adopt any mode of warfare than that recognised by the Imperial Parliament. Again, an instance had just been reported in reference to another body of Colonial Forces. The Cavalry, known as Lonsdale's Horse, had been the subject of comments in this country for their conduct; and yet the Government, through the responsible Minister, had been unable to assure the House that they could in any way control the action of those Forces. The intelligence had just reached home that Lonsdale's Horse, in consequence of their incurably bad conduct, and in consequence of their not being bound by any Discipline Act, had had to be entirely disbanded, as a set of worthless fellows, capable of the most reprehensible practices. They had been accused of thieving, highway robbery, continual drunkenness, disobedience to orders; and yet these men had been raised under a Colonial Act, which did not press upon them any obligation to obey discipline; and because of the inability on the part of their commanders to insure discipline in their ranks, they had had to be disbanded. Now, he took it, that in order to prevent cruelties which would disgrace the Imperial name, in order to prevent want of discipline and bad conduct amongst Colonial Auxiliaries acting with Imperial Forces, they ought to insist that these Colonial Forces must be absolutely subject to our Discipline Acts, the existence of Colonial Acts notwithstanding. He did not think he had said one word more than was required, for this was a point of the very first importance. He thought that where a Colony required Imperial assistance in any grave matter—and for less than a grave matter Imperial assistance ought not to be rendered—the Colony ought to submit to the common discipline imposed on the Imperial Forces.

MR. SULLIVAN thought they ought to be very careful about interfering with the Home Rule principle on the part of the Colonies. Yet, on the other hand, let them contemplate whether Colonial troops engaged under the Imperial standard could not bring disgrace upon it. He would ask the Government to recollect the recent troubles in Jamaica, where Governor Hennessey came into contact with the Legislature. And it was true, although he was sorry to have to say it, that even in South Africa the locally-raised troops were proved to be more severe and less humane than the Imperial troops themselves.

MR. PARNELL said, the point raised was one of considerable importance, although he could not exactly say whether it could be dealt with by the omission of the words at present under consideration. Undoubtedly, it might be necessary to secure respect for the Legislature of a Colony, so that their resolutions might not be entirely interfered with by an Act of this House; but, at the same time, they could not shut their eyes to the fact that in carrying out the Imperial policy of the present Government wars were undertaken in different parts of the world; that in those wars the Colonial Forces took a very considerable part; and that if they excepted those Colonial Forces from military law they could not have the same discipline kept up; and they would not have the same respect for the laws and usages of war on the part of those Forces as they would have from their own or Regular troops. At the present moment there was a very good example in Zululand. A war was being carried on there—not a Colonial, but an Imperial war—a war which had been entered into as part of the Imperial policy of the present Government. Of course, he did not mean to say that the Colonists were not entirely in favour of it. They were favourable to it, because it put money into their pockets. It was not, strictly speaking, a Colonial war, but an Imperial war, which would not have been undertaken by the Colonists by themselves. In the first place, they would have been unable to undertake it; and, in the second place, they would never have afforded it. Under those circumstances, they proposed, by the Bill as it now stood, to leave the Colonial troops, who were fighting side by side with the British troops, exempt from the operation of the military law, and subject only to the law of the Colony. That was a very great mistake. He would draw a distinction between a war which was being carried on by Colonial and Imperial Forces combined, and a war conducted by Colonial Forces alone. If the war at the Cape was being carried on entirely by Colonial troops, we would have no reason to seek any right to interfere in the conduct of the war. The Colonists would be responsible for it; they would be responsible for any act committed; and they would be liable for the result of the war. He would, therefore, not include the Forces engaged in such a war under the operation of the present Army Discipline Act; but when they had a war that was being carried on by the Imperial Government, and Colonial Forces were assisting the Imperial troops, then those Forces, whether they were fighting side by side with the Imperial soldiers, or whether they were carrying on the war separately in another district of the country—so long as the war was an Imperial one, the Colonial troops should be subjected to the provisions of the Army Discipline and Regulation Act. Were they going to insure that? If they left out the words proposed, he agreed with the remark of a previous speaker, that they would establish a very serious interference with the Colonial Legislature; that the interference so made would be of too wide and too general a character; and that, perhaps, it might be possible to provide for the matter in some different way. What he would suggest would be this—that after the word “Colony” there should be inserted—

"Always provided, that whenever Colonial Forces are acting in conjunction with the Imperial Forces the former shall be subject to the conditions of this Act."

He thought that by the adoption of an Amendment such as that they would meet the difficulty of the case which had lately arisen in Zululand. The other day his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention had been drawn to the operations of the Colonial Forces in Basutoland against the Basutos, in which those Forces had used dynamite for the purpose of blowing up the caves in which were women and children, and had also lighted fires at the mouths of other caves, proceedings which, at the time, caused great consternation in this country, rivalling, as they did, the exploits of Marshal Beugeaud in Algiers some years ago. Undoubtedly, our troops could not escape from the odium caused by excesses. Though the Imperial Forces might not be responsible, yet the state of the law was responsible; and so long as these troops were allowed to act in concert with Colonial Forces, and the latter were governed by a different military law, there must be a lax state of discipline. The contagion of example must spread; and if the Colonial Forces committed atrocities towards the Natives—if they applied fire to the mouths of caves, or used dynamite to the caves where Natives had taken refuge, or made use of explosive bullets—of which there was evidence in Zululand—then the Imperial Forces would come to do the same things; and thus the discipline of the Imperial Army would become destroyed, and a bad name become attached to the Army and the country. Therefore, it was an important question by the hon. Member for Birmingham; and to meet it, he would propose to leave out the words at the end of the section, in order to add a Proviso—

"That wherever the Colonial Forces are acting in conjunction with Imperial Forces, all shall be subject to the military law of this country."

In this way would be met that difficulty which had been referred to as arising in Zululand. The Secretary of State for the Colonies, a few days ago, said the Government had no control over the Colonial Forces, and was not responsible; but he said he would make representations to the Colonial Government, to request that the operations might be carried on in accordance with the rules of war. But this was not sufficient. Let there be a clause that would show every Colony that if they expected aid from the Imperial Forces of the Crown, then the whole Force in the field must be subject to the rules and regulations of the Bill.

MR. E. JENKINS pointed out that the present section referred to officers only; and asked the Committee to consider what would be the position of an officer selected to serve in a Colony, and in command of Forces raised under a Colonial Act? Necessarily, that officer would be governed by the regulations and discipline of the Colony in which he served. Ultimately, of course, his allegiance would be to Her Majesty; but his direct allegiance, in the meantime, would be to the Colony in which he was serving. By this section it was provided that he would remain under those regulations and that discipline, even though he might temporarily come under the command of an officer of the Regular Forces. Surely this was absolutely necessary, and what was desired by the Amendment was really secured. The moment an officer commanded in the Regular Forces, he came within the purview of the Bill; and while in a Colonial Force, he remained under the Colonial Act. The words in the section implied he would come within the purview of the Act; they provided that the persons mentioned were subject to military law as officers, and then the section went on to declare—

"All such persons not otherwise subject to military law as may be serving in the position of officers of any troops or portions of troops raised by order of Her Majesty beyond the limits of the United Kingdom."

The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) said troops raised in Canada or the Cape were not troops raised by order of Her Majesty; but these would come under the Colonial Act, and to these the present Act was not intended to apply. The clause appeared to him a reasonable one, and he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, no doubt the last explanation was an admirable one; but it was not consistent with that given by the Secretary of State for War.

The right hon. and gallant Gentleman in answering the Question—for it was only a Question originally—said there were always discrepancies between the treatment of troops serving partly as Colonial and partly as Imperial Forces, and he said usually the Colonial Legislatures deferred to the Imperial law. But he (Mr. Chamberlain) supposed that, in some cases, this deference was not shown; and if not shown in all cases, then it might fail to be shown in any case. Then they would have the Colonial law either more or less stringent than the Imperial law; they would have British troops serving under the same General Officer with Colonial troops; and they would have the British troops flogged under this Bill, while the Colonial troops, for the same offences, escaped scot-free. The hon. Member for Meath had suggested his object might be obtained by retaining the Proviso in the Bill, and adding another thereto; but the effect of that would be to make the Colonial law, in every case where the Colonial Forces acted with Imperial troops, as stringent as the Imperial law. He was not certain that would be an advantage; and he did not think that any English-speaking Colony would adopt the barbarous punishment of flogging, and he was not anxious to increase the severity of Colonial military law. But he would not trouble the Committee to divide, because he was willing to leave the point to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman whether it was desirable to assimilate the Colonial military law; and not having given Notice of the Amendment, he had no wish to take the Committee by surprise. He, therefore, asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, in reference to the hon. Member's (Mr. Chamberlain's) remarks upon the different treatment of Colonial and British soldiers, said, if the Amendment was carried, the result would probably be that under both Codes a soldier would be fined first and flogged afterwards. In the allusion made to the war against the Basutos, it should be remembered that those operations were carried on under Colonial authority and by Colonial, not Imperial, Forces. In Natal, however, it was not so; for there the troops were under an Imperial commander, subject to military law. He would like the

Mr. Chamberlain

Attorney General to clear up a doubt as to whether a Colonial Force, raised under such circumstances as the Force known as "Lonsdale's Horse," came under the Colonial administration, or came within the meaning of the paragraph referring to troops "raised by order of Her Majesty?"

MR. O'DONNELL thought that the argument of the hon. Member (Mr. Chamberlain) would defeat his own object. If the Act should be extended, without limitation, to the Colonies, then Colonial troops would come within the flogging clauses of the Bill; but if, on the other hand, there was this contract that Imperial troops were subject to flogging—a punishment to which Colonial troops refused to submit—this would work in the direction of the policy supported from these Benches—the abolition of flogging altogether. Government would find that they would, in every case, have to make it part of the bargain with the Colony that flogging should be abolished. Besides, the Bill had not yet passed; and it was by no means certain that the flogging clauses would remain in the Bill until the end. The Government might appeal to the country on this issue—flogging in the Army or not? So there was not the slightest reason for the hon. Member to be anxious about the flogging not yet having existence in this uncompleted Bill. In all probability, before the Bill became law those clauses would disappear.

MR. CHILDERS said, it had recently been the recognized policy to encourage our Colonies to provide for their own military defence, and, under their local Acts, provisions for pay, clothing, promotion, &c. had been made. When the Army was in the field, brigaded with Her Majesty's Army, it became necessary that the whole Force should be under one discipline, and this the Bill would provide. But if some such words as those in the Bill were not introduced, then the Colonial Acts would be inoperative, and the Imperial Government would have to provide for the charge and internal economy of the Colonial Forces. It was necessary, therefore, to put all the Forces under one Act for purposes of discipline, leaving the internal arrangements under the Colonial Acts.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, this difficulty had only arisen through changing the words of the original Act into the words now proposed—"troops raised by order of Her Majesty." Troops raised in the Colony could not be said to be raised by order of the Sovereign, and the clause gave rise to much uncertainty.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER was rather inclined to oppose the withdrawal of the Amendment, for the matter had been very fairly ventilated; and if the discussion was closed now, to be revived on Report, all the ground would have to be travelled over again. He could not quite understand the argument of his hon. Friend, unless he proceeded on the assumption that the discipline in the Imperial Forces was more humane than that in the Colonial Forces, an assumption not altogether proved. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had referred to instances of cruelty practised by the Colonial Forces; but this was cruelty practised towards the enemy, not upon their own men, and how were they to make provision so that such cruelties might not be repeated? This point required clearing up. The Imperial Government did, of course, exercise influence over the Colonial action in that respect; and, indeed, it was not an unusual thing, when any cruelty was practised under the Government of any State in Europe, it was not unfrequently the case that the Government made certain representations to prevent a repetition of such cruelties. This course was followed in the case of Turkey, and in the case of Russia as against Poland. Surely, it was presumable the same thing could be done with the Colonies, even though the Colonial Army were not directly included under the authority of Her Majesty the Queen. He could see that much difficulty would be removed by the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Meath.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL again expressed a hope that it would be clearly defined by the Law Officers how far the Act was to apply to Colonial Forces.

COLONEL STANLEY said, such Forces could only be raised under the authority of an Act, and an Act required the assent of the Crown. He was sorry if he had misunderstood the hon. Member's (Mr. Chamberlain's) Amendment; but it had been so well answered by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), and the right hon. Gentleman opposite

(Mr. Childers), that it was unnecessary to add more. He looked upon this as a protection clause for the Colonies, and giving to the Colonies such jurisdiction as was necessary. With regard to his general assertion, that Colonial law usually followed Imperial law, of course it was covered by the understanding that in all cases the assent of the Crown was required to local Acts.

MR. E. JENKINS said, Her Majesty was Commander-in-Chief in every Colonial Act of Parliament.

MR. PARNELL was sorry that the Secretary of State for the Colonies was not present. Upon the Colonial law, of course, it was not to be expected that the Secretary of State for War had any practical knowledge, and the Committee were left to the guidance of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), who had taken a personal interest in the Colonies, and gave the Committee the benefit of his information. Now, the question had been raised with regard to India—

THE CHAIRMAN hoped the hon. Member would see he was going beyond the scope of the Amendment.

MR. PARNELL thought that the officials of the Crown in charge of Departments should be present when those parts of the Bill connected with their Departments came on for the consideration of the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had not felt it his duty to interpose before; but the hon. Member would not be in Order in discussing the general conduct of the officials of the Crown.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER rose to a point of Order, and suggested that if his hon. Friend thought it necessary that the Secretary of State for the Colonies should explain the point, then his hon. Friend might move to report Progress until the right hon. Gentleman could be present. At the same time, he did not advise such a course.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member was at liberty to move to report Progress, if he thought proper to do so.

MR. PARNELL moved to report Progress, not for the purpose of taking a division, but in order to express his opinion with regard to the Officers of the Crown, who were responsible for parts of this Bill. He thought the Under Secretary of State for India, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, should be in attendance when parts of the Bill were reached which affected their Departments. Otherwise, the Committee was placed in a very false position; and it was the business of those Gentlemen, who were in receipt of large salaries, to inform the House on questions affecting their Departments. Some Members of the Government appeared to take an interest in the discharge of their duties. The Home Secretary, for example, had always attended when clauses of this Bill were under consideration which related to his Department. On the other hand, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the Under Secretary of State for India treated the Committee and the Bill with that lofty disdain with which they seemed to treat every question which was asked of them in reference to their Departments. As the Secretary of State for War, of course, knew nothing about those points, they were driven back upon the opinion of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), who, although he was acquainted with these subjects, yet could not deal with the matter with the authority of a Member of the Government. They wished to avoid what had happened recently in Zululand, and to provide that when Colonial Forces were serving with British troops in the field, they should be subject to the same laws and regulations as the British troops. It was a very important question, whether these Colonial Forces were exempt or not. Yet they were entirely dependent upon amateur assistance for an explanation of the point.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. O'DONNELL did not think the presence of the Secretary of State for the Colonies would result in the communication of any information to the Committee. All the Officers of the Government could not be considered to hold important positions; for, in his opinion, the Judge Advocate General and the Chief Secretary for Ireland simply filled sinecure posts, intended for the more ornamental Ministers of the Administration. They were receiving most discordant views from the Treasury Bench. They were now told that the Colonial Forces in the field under Imperial command would be subject to this Army Discipline Bill; yet the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War told them, a short time ago, that he was not responsible for throwing dynamite into caves in which were women and children. He should like to know which of these two statements was the correct one?

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, on subsection 5, suggested that it might be amended so as to read—

"Officers of the yeomanry, and officers of the volunteers, whenever they are in actual command of men, who are in pursuance of this Act subject to military law."

That would meet the case of trainings; and then he would also add the words—"or when their corps is on actual military service."

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 92, line 27, before "orders," insert "general or special." His object was to cover a point raised the other day.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the clause seemed to have a most serious and important effect. By it a political officer, or a Civil Commissioner, or even an envoy travelling with Military Forces, was liable to be tried by court martial, and that seemed to be very extraordinary. Sir Bartle Frere, according to this clause, if he were with the troops, might be tried by martial law. He would like to know whether it was the intention, if, for instance, a political officer differed from an officer in charge of the troops, that he should thereby subject himself to be tried by court martial?

COLONEL STANLEY observed, that this clause placed certain persons in the position of officers.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that was all very well; but he wanted it clear, whether officers, such as he had mentioned, were to be tried by court martial?

Amendment agreed to.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved, in page 92, lines 27 and 28, after "Governor General of India," to insert "subject to military law."

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the Committee would not accept the Amendment, for it seemed to him absolutely indispensable that persons accompanying a Force should be under the control of the officer in command. Nothing could be more dangerous than to have a person accompanying the Forces not under discipline and with no recognized status. He himself, and the First Lord of the Admiralty, were subject to Naval law when on board ship; and it would be enforced against them if they violated it. He was quite willing to accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt).

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN pointed out that this might produce very serious results.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished to understand whether a Governor or Ambassador, travelling in one of Her Majesty's ships, was liable to be tried by court martial, if, for instance, he failed to put out a light?

COLONEL STANLEY said he would be.

MR. HOPWOOD pointed out that there were a number of provisions in the Naval Discipline Act which were very peculiar to which he had, at an earlier period of the Session, called attention, and which the Committee ought not to sanction. Under certain circumstances, even a Colonial Bishop on board a ship commissioned by Her Majesty might, it was said, be liable to be flogged; and, for some reasons, it was to be hoped that a Bishop might be placed in such a position, because nothing could so perfectly demonstrate the extravagance of such law.

MR. PARNELL opposed the Amendment. If they agreed to it, they would require a new scale of punishments. The present scale only referred to officers and soldiers, not to other persons who were now proposed subject to martial law.

Amendment negatived.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, the early parts of this clause subjected certain persons to military law as officers, followed by a qualification that where such persons were Natives of India they should be subject to the Indian military law. This was one of several clauses which took Native Indians in the employment of this country out of this Bill and relegated them to what was called the Indian military law. He thought that ought not to be, and that the Natives of India ought to enjoy all the benefits of any amelioration of our Military Code, and not be subject to the mercies of vague Articles of War. Englishmen were far too prone to regard persons with black skins as entirely different beings. In the Cape papers he found the Zulus constantly described as "niggers;" and he had often seen similar language used with respect even to the Natives of India. Under these circumstances, the House of Commons ought to be very careful to give Native soldiers exactly the same protection that they gave their own countrymen. He moved, in page 92, line 30, to leave out from the word "seas," to the end of the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 92, line 30, to leave out from the word "seas," to the end of the clause.—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL remarked that, so far as his recollection went, the Indian Code was less, not more severe, than that in force in this country.

MR. E. STANHOPE protested against the impression that the Indian Code was more severe than English military law. That was not at all the case; and, if he were in Order in discussing the point, he should be able point out that it was not by any means so severe. He should also like to observe that this exception was favourable to the Natives—as, for instance, a Native of India could be tried by court martial composed partly of Native Indians.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN remarked, that he did not intend to press the matter; but he might point out that the Indian Army was subject to Articles of which they in that House knew nothing; and he should be glad to know whether there was any objection to lay them on the Table of the House?

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the Indian Articles of War were printed and in the Library. The hon. Member was incorrect in another point, for he said that it was the custom of Indian officers, and other public servants, to speak of the Natives as "niggers."

No Native was ever so spoken of, except by some young Englishmen, just come out, who knew nothing of the Service.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN begged to correct the hon. and gallant Gentleman. His statement was that he had seen it in the Cape papers in reference to the Natives of Africa.

Mr. E. JENKINS observed, that the clause, as it stood, was unnecessary. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman would look at page 97, he would find that it was there stated that—

"Nothing in this Act shall prejudice or affect the Indian military law respecting officers or soldiers or followers in Her Majesty's Indian forces."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE understood that his hon. Friend did not wish to divide; but he had no doubt that any modification of the law which was necessary, in consequence of the changes in this Bill, would, as far as circumstances justified, be recommended by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. E. Stanhope).

PRIVILEGE — PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE — NOTE-TAKING IN THE MEMBERS' SIDE-GALLERY.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. SULLIVAN: I believe, Sir, you are aware that no stranger in the Galleries is allowed, by the regulations of this House, to take notes of our proceedings. The question was asked, with the Speaker in the Chair, the other day, of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether it was by his orders, and by his permission, that a new functionary was introduced? It was pointed out that a person was making certain notes with pencil and paper in one of the Galleries, and more especially was noting the words of certain, and only certain, Members of this House. He noted when they rose, and how long they spoke. Mr. Raikes, I wish to ask you whether it is in Order, and whether such a practice should go on? I wish to know, from whoever can tell me, by whose direction this new functionary has been constituted, and with what purpose? I now call attention to the fact that the young gentleman is now engaged in the Gallery on your left. As regards the young gentleman intrusted with this delicate and responsible work, I am sure he has not done it without proper direction, and to him, personally, not the slightest blame can be attached. But we desire to know in what character this proceeding is attempted; why this—I do not want to use the word in any offensive way—sort of espionage is to lead up to any punishment, or to any menace of punishment, to a Member of this House? I now ask, Mr. Raikes, if it is allowable any more to such gentlemen than to any strangers who happen to be present at our debates to take notes of our proceedings? In calling your attention to this serious matter, I would beg to remind you that when complaint was made about the want of accommodation for the legitimate representatives of the Press of the country in this House, barely a year ago, that an application was made, or rather it was suggested, that the representatives of the Press might be allowed to take notes in the ordinary Strangers' Gallery, and that that application or suggestion was refused, on the ground that no one whatever outside the Reporters' Gallery should be allowed to take notes of our proceedings. I have seen gentlemen of importance immediately rebuked by the ushers in attendance, and ordered to give up their papers and pencil. I believe it, Sir, to be unprecedented, and I appeal to you for direction in this matter. I ask, by whose authority this is done? Let the person on whose authority this has been done avow it and tell us his purpose.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member has put a question on a point of Order, which certainly, under ordinary circumstances, is one which should be rather addressed to the Speaker in full House than to the Chairman of the Committee. But I would point out to him that the Rule to which he has referred is one which is not an actual Order of the House, but a recognized Rule, which prohibits strangers from taking notes of the proceedings of this House in the Galleries. I did not understand the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that the person to whom he has referred is a stranger. [Mr. SULLIVAN: Yes.] But if he is an official of this House he is not a stranger, and his performance of any act in this House must, in the first instance, be presumed to be done with the sanction, and under the authority, of those under whose responsibility such a person is covered. It would be impossible for the Business of this House to be carried on if the subordinate officials of this House were to be, in the first instance, responsible to the House for their conduct. The Speaker is presumably the fountain and source of the action of all the officials of this House; and it seems to me that if the hon. and learned Member wishes to raise any question on the subject, that the question should rather be addressed to the Speaker, than to any Member of this House.

MR. SULLIVAN: In order that we may have the Speaker in the Chair, I beg to move to report Progress. I am simply carrying out your suggestion.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I would respectfully suggest that, if possible, the Motion should be accepted without any unnecessary debate. I am sure my hon. and learned Friend has no desire to interrupt the progress of this Bill; and I wish, at the outset, before any discussion on the subject is raised, to point out that if this Motion is assented to, we shall have an opportunity of having an authoritative statement from the Speaker, and have an opportunity of debating it before the Speaker. If hon. Gentlemen choose to exercise it, they have, no doubt, a right to debate the question whether we shall report Progress. Undoubtedly then, however, we shall have a long discussion, and then, probably, have the debate all over again, with the Speaker in the Chair. I merely rise, in the interests of the despatch of Business, to suggest that no undue obstacle should be placed in the way of making an appeal to the Speaker in the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. and learned Member to move to report Progress, not for the purpose of stopping the Bill, but to ask a question of the Speaker; and, therefore, it would be better that he should put on paper the Motion he will make—namely, that I should report Progress, with a view to report the circumstances to which he refers to the Speaker.

MR. SULLIVAN: I will bring up the words.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Chairman do report Progress, in order that, with Mr. Speaker in the Chair, a question may be raised as to notes being taken by a person, in the Members' Side Gallery of the House, not being a Member of the House." —(Mr. Sullivan.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is clearly desirable that this point should be disposed of without delay, if, by doing so, we do not interrupt the progress of the Bill—that we resume our work when the question is disposed of. I think we ought clearly to understand that the Motion being agreed to, and the point decided, that you, Sir, can again take the Chair, and proceed with the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that when a special reference is made with the object that the conduct of Members, or any similar matter, may be taken into consideration—after that has been disposed of, the Committee can resume its sitting.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think then, Sir, we should save time by agreeing to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER resumed the Chair:—and Mr. RAIKES reported Progress accordingly.

MR. SULLIVAN: Mr. Speaker, with the Chairman of Committees in the Chair I put a question which, I believe, may be more fitly put to you, and more efficiently answered by you. I believe there is a Rule that, except in that portion of our House set apart for the legitimate representatives of public opinion—namely, the representatives of the Press—no one who is not a Member of the House has a right to take notes or records of our proceedings with pencil or with pen and paper. Nevertheless, a Question was put the other evening in the House, calling attention, on the part of the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan), to the appearance, in one of our side Galleries, of a gentleman, not a Member of the House, engaged in taking notes—notes, apparently, of a very peculiar kind—namely, notes having reference to the conduct of special individuals of the House. I, myself, have seen and called the attention of the Chairman of Committees to the fact that there was present in the Members' side Gallery—not in the Gallery of the gentlemen of the Press—a stranger, not a Member of the House, engaged in making such notes and record of our proceedings. I was desirous of knowing, Sir, whether this was not, in the first place, an unusual proceeding, whether done by or without authority? If done by authority, I wanted to know by whose authority it was done; and I wanted to know, secondly, with what purpose or object such proceedings were taken? I, myself, saw the young gentleman so engaged. I at once addressed him, and said—“Of course, if I take any notice of your proceedings in the House, it must not be considered that I am casting any reflection upon you.” I thought it right to indicate to him that some notice must be taken of his proceedings. I do not wish to cast any blame upon him. That young gentleman is a stranger to me; but, I presume, he must be engaged in some way about the House, and that he is acting by authority, and I intend to deal with that authority as far as I respectfully may. Sir, the question of reporting our proceedings is, as you are aware, a very old and very ancient consideration in the House of Commons of England. It has been very jealously guarded in the way of bringing men to the Bar of the House, from time to time, for the offence of making a record of our proceedings. The representatives of two of the greatest journals of the country were once brought to the Bar of the House for this offence. If this is a fair report of all that was passing in the House, I certainly should be blind and deaf to it; and, I need hardly say, I should not raise any objection on the technical point of its being written in the Members’ side Gallery; but if this is to be an instruction to note any particular individuals in this House—their rising and sitting down, the words they use, the Amendments they speak upon, and how often they speak—then, Sir, I resent it as most offensive. I resent it as being, in some way, as though intended to lead up to censure and punishment; and I resent it as not being the open-handed way of dealing with Members which ought to characterize punishment, or any step towards punishment, by the House. And now, Sir, I respectfully ask you if it is in Order for anyone, not a Member of the House, to sit in the Members’ side Gallery, and be habitually employed, with pencil and paper, in making notes and records of our proceedings, and especially with reference to particular Members of the House; secondly, by whose authority this unusual course has been taken; and, thirdly, with what views such course is being taken?

MR. CALLAN: Mr. Speaker, I wish to supplement these questions. I can fully corroborate the hon. and learned Member who has just spoken. Last week my attention was directed to the matter, and I noticed that the arrangement only applied to the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill. Sir, I remember, before I became a Member of this House, when seated in the Gallery, receiving a peremptory order not to take a note in my book. Since I became a Member of the House, I have repeatedly seen the officers of the Sergeant-at-Arms exercise the same control over others. We have a Gallery for the reporters. We have had a Committee sitting on the question of reporting, and we are now waiting for their final decision upon the Report. It is within the recollection of all the Members of the House that you, Sir, decided that the seats in the side Gallery were seats within the House, and that from them any Member so pleased could address you; therefore, they are as much the seats of hon. Members as the seats upon which we sit. But it is not a stranger who has been taking notes in that Gallery; it is one of our own officers, who has been directed, by some authority in the House, to take notes. It is of no use blinking the question. An attempt has been made to intimidate Members by infringing upon the freedom of debate, and by means of officers of this House appointed, I am sorry to say, not by this House, but by the Chief Clerk, as I understand. Those officers, in communication with some higher officials, have been directed to spy—and it has not been thought derogatory to the officers of this House to set them to spy—upon a particular section of Members of this House. Sir, we resent that; and those of us who are connected with the Press are proud to think that the individuals who have been so deputed are not members of the Press. This charge is made against Mr. Jenkinson and Mr. Le Marchant, two of the Committee Clerks of this House, who have, on Monday and Tuesday of last week, during the time that the Army Regulation and Discipline Bill was in Committee, taken notes of the number and duration of the speeches of Irish Members. ["Hear, hear!"] Am I to take that "hear, hear!" to mean that Conservative Members approve of this system of intimidating Irish Members? Am I to take it that they approve of a Clerk of the House being used as a spy upon the Irish Members? I again say, Sir, that on Monday and Tuesday I saw one of these gentlemen taking notes, and he is again taking them to day. But, yesterday, he was remarkable for his absence, for there was an English question before the House, and no note was taken of the speeches made upon that occasion. I hold it to be a most improper and dishonourable proceeding to allow a Clerk of this House, sitting in the place of a Member—

MR. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. Member does not apply the epithet of "dishonourable" to any officer of the House.

MR. CALLAN: I spoke of the act, and not of the officer. I believe the two Clerks who took the notes are as honourable—

MR. DODSON: I rise to Order. I wish to know, Sir—apart from the question whether the taking a note—[Mr. CALLAN: Systematic.] Systematic, or otherwise—is or is not inconsistent with the Rules and practice of the House—whether such an act as that which has been referred to should be characterized as dishonourable?

MR. CALLAN: I am sorry, but not surprised, at the support given to these proceedings by the right hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson).

MR. DODSON: I rise to Order. I gave no support to the act—I expressed no opinion concerning it, except that I asked whether such act—and I ask it again—can be fairly characterized as dishonourable?

MR. SPEAKER: In my judgment the hon. Member for Dundalk is bound to withdraw such words used towards an officer of this House.

MR. CALLAN: I never intended to apply it to any officer of the House, and, therefore, I have no hesitation in withdrawing it. I said that I had not the slightest intention of applying it to any officer of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the time has now come when I ought to interpose in this matter, and to say that if the act in question be dishonourable it is an act done by my authority. If the House will allow me I will state, in very few words, what I authorized to be done; and after I have stated what I have authorized I am persuaded that I shall give satisfaction—at least, I trust so—to every quarter of the House. As the House is aware, according to the practice of the House, Minutes of our proceedings are taken from day to day. These Minutes are published in the Votes as hon. Members see them every morning. Lately—for some time at least—it has come to my knowledge that there has been great delay—unexpected delay—in the progress of the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill through Committee; and on my own responsibility, and for my own information, I desired that Minutes should be taken of the proceedings on that Bill of a more full character than those which are taken from day to day. I may say that those Minutes have no reference whatever to particular Members of the House. They are fair and impartial reports of the proceedings of the House—and I am surprised that any body of Members should suppose that I was having reports taken in reference to particular Members. I should be exceeding my duty if I were so to do. I again say to the House that the Minutes I have had taken have no reference whatever to individual Members of this House—whether Irish, Scotch, or English Members—that they are fair and impartial reports of the proceedings of the House, and taken upon my own responsibility.

MR. PARNELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to ask you a question. You have just now informed the House that, acting upon your own responsibility, you have directed certain Minutes to be taken of the proceedings of the House, and that those Minutes are not in reference to any particular Members, or to any particular section of Members. May I ask you, Sir, as to the nature and extent of those Minutes—whether they constitute a verbatim report of what is said by each Member of the House in the course of the debates upon the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill? And if that be not so, may I ask you to describe to the House the nature of those Minutes?

MR. SPEAKER: I can only say, in answer to the hon. Member, that there was no idea of making verbatim reports of what is said in the House. I can only describe them as Minutes more enlarged than those which hon. Members see upon their tables every day, specifying the Members who speak.

MR. PARNELL: All?

MR. SPEAKER: All.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Mr. Speaker, I think it will be generally admitted that the House has always been jealous of allowing its proceedings to be reported, and I think it will be also admitted that the act which you were pleased to authorize is without precedent in the history of the House of Commons. ["Oh, oh!"] If I am wrong in making this statement, hon. Gentlemen will have ample opportunity of contradicting me. I make that statement again, and believe it cannot be contradicted. At all events, it can be tested by reference to the Records of the House. It appears to me, Sir, that if you felt it would be an assistance to you, in the discharge of your duties as Speaker of this House, to have a more enlarged report of its proceedings, it would have been only fair to the House to have come down and asked for the consent of the House to a proceeding which, however necessary it might be, was without precedent in the annals of Parliament. I must say, as one of the Members of this House, that I do not see, Sir, from the statement which you have been pleased to make——

MR. SPEAKER: The Committee has reported to the House a question to be submitted to me. That question has been put to the Chair and has been answered from the Chair; and I presume that the proceeding is thus terminated, and that the Committee will resume. If the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), or any other hon. Member, desires to raise a discussion on the proceedings of the Speaker, he is entitled to do so by Motion in the House. That is the proper course to take. The Report of the Committee has been made to the House, and I consider that the question has been fully answered. The House will now proceed to the consideration of the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill in Committee.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Mr. Speaker. I rise to Order. I protest against this.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL, again considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Amendment again proposed, in page 92, line 30, to leave out from the word "seas," to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. Chamberlain).

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Mr. Raikes, I beg leave to move that you do report Progress. The reason why I make this Motion is that I am not satisfied with the proceedings of the Committee at an earlier stage—namely, that of reporting a certain matter by you to Mr. Speaker. Well, Sir, the Speaker decided that the Business for which the House was called upon to resume, and the discussion which followed upon the Report from the Committee, had concluded when he had answered the question which was put to him; and I was, therefore, unable to make, as I had intended, a Motion for the adjournment of the House. The hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) explained to you the grounds upon which he moved that you do report Progress. I am not entitled to say whether there were other grounds in his mind or not; but I supported his Motion, because I was thoroughly dissatisfied with the discovery which he made of a person engaged in the Gallery in reporting our proceedings. I feel it is a restriction upon the Privileges of the House for any gentleman sitting in the Gallery to report our proceedings, whether authorized to do so by the Speaker or anybody else. I rise to move that Progress be reported, in order that the House may not be deprived of its jurisdiction on a matter unheard of in the annals of the House of Commons, and that it may resume the full exercise of its functions.

Mr. Parnell

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope, Sir, that the Motion will not be pressed, or made the beginning of what I think may become a very unseemly discussion. I must remind the Committee that the position is this. A question was raised by the hon. and learned Member for Louth, upon which it was thought right that the Committee should report Progress, in order to put a question to the Speaker as to certain notes which were being taken in the Gallery. The question was put, and the Speaker has answered it—he has stated that it was by his authority that the notes were taken. I presume we are not thinking of disputing the ruling of the Chair? [Mr. PARNELL: Yes.] At the same time, the Speaker pointed out that if any Member of the House desired to dispute his ruling, and had a desire to bring this matter before the House, the proper course for him to take would be to submit a Motion on the subject: and I apprehend that if the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), or the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), or any other Member, wishes to raise the question, the proper action would be to take the course pointed out by the Speaker. I apprehend, however, after what has been said, that there will be no necessity for taking any such step; but this is a matter upon which I do not presume to speak with authority, and, possibly, some hon. Members may take a different view of it. I hope that we may not have the Business which we are upon interrupted by a discussion which may take a very irregular range. We must consider that we are now discussing the clauses of a Bill, and that we are not competent to discuss a question of the character which has been raised.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The course which has been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman appears to me not only convenient in reference to the course of Business this evening, but absolutely necessary, from the point of view of common fairness. Nothing can be a more well-known and recognized rule of our proceedings than that, when the conduct of any Member of the House is called in question, it should be done upon Notice, and when the House is fully prepared to take into consideration the matter which is thus raised. I understand, from some observations by which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was interrupted, that it is proposed by some hon. Members to call in question the conduct of the Speaker. Well, Sir, I have nothing to say against the right of hon. Members to take that course; but, surely, it is perfectly obvious that that course ought not to be followed without due Notice? I must say, after the statement of the Speaker had been made, that I expected the discussion would, at all events for the time, have concluded, and that the hon. and learned Member for Louth would at once have risen to express his regret at having inadvertently accused the person whose proceedings have been mentioned of taking one-sided and partial notes in the Gallery, when he had been told that those notes were of a general and impartial character. I cannot help thinking that a decision upon this subject in Committee would be extremely inconvenient, and I think, also, scarcely fair to the highest authority in the House, whose conduct in this matter is impugned—whose conduct ought not to be impugned—and whose conduct, I am sure, no one would wish to impugn—except in the most deliberate and solemn manner.

MR. CALLAN: The statement of the noble Lord is just one which I should have expected to hear from him, and the course suggested by him is one in which I entirely concur. It is the course which I intended to adopt, with this exception. If you give Notice of bringing a matter of this kind before the House, you lose your right of privilege and precedence. Therefore, I intended, before raising the question, to give private Notice to the Speaker, and the other parties who may be conceived to be interested in the case. It is quite evident that Notice will be given; but I advise my hon. Friends to give private Notice, so as not to lose their right of precedence, and of bringing it forward as a Breach of Privilege. But, pending that decision, I ask, is it respectful to this House, that any portion of the House itself, set apart exclusively for Members of Parliament, and laid down by the Speaker himself as a portion of the House from which hon. Members can speak—is it right and proper that we should have, what we conceive to be, a kind of intimidation and restriction on the freedom—

COLONEL STANLEY: I rise to Order. I ask whether, after the Speaker has, from the Chair, stated that the course to which the hon. Member refers is one taken by his directions, it is right for the hon. Member to refer to it as “a course of intimidation?”

MR. CALLAN: I make no imputation whatever on the Speaker.

THE CHAIRMAN: When the right hon. and gallant Gentleman rose I was about to point out to the hon. Member for Dundalk that the word “intimidation” is one which is never allowed in this House to be applied to any Member of this House. Do I understand the hon. Member to say it is not so applied?

MR. CALLAN: It is not so applied. I said it was conceived by the Members of the House that the course complained of had been taken for that purpose. I may say that nothing of the kind would intimidate me. But pending this question, which is to be raised at an early date, I ask, is it not right that the party who is conceived to have offended should be asked to withdraw from the portion of the House which is the property of Members?

THE CHAIRMAN: I beg to point out to the hon. Member that the question which he now proposes to put is one which should have been put at an earlier stage of the Business of the House, and not in Committee. It is not in the power of the Chairman of Committees to exercise the jurisdiction to which the hon. Member refers.

MR. CALLAN: I believe that if a stranger—a bucolic farmer from the Agricultural Show, for instance—were to sit down in that Gallery, it would be the duty of the Serjeant-at-Arms to remove him?

THE CHAIRMAN: The two questions are entirely and wholly dissimilar. The authority of the Chairman of Committees can unquestionably be exercised with regard to strangers; but when an official is performing a duty to which he has been appointed by the highest authority in the House, it is clearly not within the power or the duty of the Chairman of Committees to interfere.

MR. PARNELL: The advice of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition—I do not want to enter into the debatable question whether he is Leader of the Opposition or not—is one which we might be better disposed to take if it was in accordance with the Rules and precedents of the House, and if it had not come from one who has shown himself, during the discussions of this Bill, a deliberate partizan of the Government in attempting to carry it through the House with all its imperfections. He has upon several occasions shown himself to be such a Government partizan—such a Government supporter—that, at first sight, any advice that came from him must be more or less tainted or discredited. How can we go on with this thing hanging over us? It will be in the recollection of the Committee that the Speaker left the Chair without giving an opportunity to Members of this House to raise the question of Privilege, which they desired to raise. This is a question of Breach of Privilege by the Speaker of this House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must ask you, Sir, whether that is language which ought to be applied to the Speaker? The words were “Breach of Privilege by the Speaker of this House.”

THE CHAIRMAN: The words appear to me to be extremely improper, and such as I trust the hon. Member, upon his attention being called to them, will be prepared to withdraw. I did not understand the hon. Member absolutely to impute to any Member of the House direct Breach of Privilege. What I understood the hon. Member to say was, that it was a question whether such Breach of Privilege had been committed. I am not prepared to say that, in putting the question in this form, the hon. Member is directly out of Order; but I think he will see, on reflection, that the words were such as he would be sorry to have used in reference to a Member of the House.

MR. PARNELL: I said this was a question of Breach of Privilege, and we feel that we cannot go on any longer with the discussion of this Bill without having the decision of the House upon the question. The Speaker of the House is no more than the servant of the House. He is for certain purposes—on questions of Order, and so forth—the mouth-piece of the House; but the Speaker has no original jurisdiction whatever. He has no jurisdiction but what is given him by the existing Orders, Rules, and Regulations in this House; and any Member has at any time the right to call in question the conduct even of you, Mr. Raikes; and any Member of this House is entitled to call in question the conduct of the Speaker of the House. And we do call in question the conduct of the Speaker of the House, and we do impugn the conduct of the Speaker in having directed—

MR. DODSON: I rise to Order. I wish to submit to your judgment whether, in Committee of the House on this or any other Bill, it is in the power of hon. Members to discuss the conduct of the Speaker of the House, or the Rules and Forms of the House?

MR. PARNELL: May I explain? ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: I point out to the hon. Member that he may speak to Order after the question which has been addressed to the Chair has been answered. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) has asked me whether the hon. Member for Meath would be in Order in impugning the conduct of the Speaker? I have just pointed out to the hon. Member for Meath that such a course would not be in Order. A Committee of the House is not the place, and this is not the occasion, when such a course could, with propriety, be taken; but I must also point out to the hon. Member and to the Committee that the practice of endeavouring to raise questions as to what has passed in the House on the Motion to report Progress is one which ought to be avoided. The hon. Member and other hon. Members have alleged, as reasons for reporting Progress, their dissatisfaction at the course taken in the House, and I have not felt it my duty to stop them. The reference, however, to what has taken place in the House as a matter of discussion would be entirely out of place and out of Order.

MR. PARNELL: We wish to impugn the conduct of the Speaker of the House, before the House, and with the Speaker in the Chair. We do not wish to take that step in Committee, and I am aware that the Committee has no authority to take such a course, or entertain such a proposal. We wish the Committee to consent to the Motion to report Progress, in order that we may raise the question with the Speaker in the Chair. The gentleman alluded to sits in the Gallery, and, as I am informed, has resumed the practice. Whether that information is correct or not, we shall continue to do our duty under circumstances of great disadvantage as long as that one-sided practice is continued.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I rise to Order. The hon. Gentleman asserted that the practice to which he objects is one-sided. He says that, having distinctly heard Mr. Speaker say that it was impartial and applied equally to all Members. I wish to know whether the hon. Member is in Order in making such a statement?

THE CHAIRMAN: The observation of the hon. Member is one which I cannot say is out of Order. The hon. Member expressed his opinion as to this practice, and so long as it is expressed in Parliamentary terms I cannot say it is out of Order. At the same time, I point out that it cannot be considered respectful to the Committee to indulge in the tone which he has throughout the whole of his address manifested, in declaring himself openly against the decision of the highest authority of the House.

MR. PARNELL: But there is a still higher authority, and that is the House itself. We desire to submit to the House, and we are willing to abide by its decision, a question of importance to hon. Members. We ask from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he will give us an opportunity, without further delay, to take the opinion of the House upon a question which is of the highest importance to us in the discharge of our duties. I presume the young man now taking notes takes down the name of each Member who rises; but, so far as I know, he does not take down what they say. I submit that that practice is surely derogatory to the power that we enjoy as Members of a Committee of this House. It renders it exceedingly difficult to us to discharge our duties, and it renders us exceedingly liable to misapprehension. This practice is not sanctioned by any Rule or Order of the House—on the contrary, it is directly forbidden. No outside persons can take notes of the proceedings of the House. And if we allow such a practice to continue now it will grow into a precedent, and, as a precedent, it will become the rule of Parliament. We desire that the House of Commons should, at once and without further delay, be afforded an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion, "Yes" or "No," as to whether the practice which the Speaker has directed is an authorized practice or not, and as to whether it is according to the law of Parliament. This is a very simple request. The absurd opposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and of the Leader of the Opposition is really standing in the way of the conduct of Public Business, and, but for this, we might have had the opinion of the House long ago. We are told we can raise this question at the proper time; but when will be the proper time? If it is not a question of Privilege, no hon. Member would have time to raise it during the Session; because Government have announced their intention of annexing all the Tuesdays and Wednesdays during the remainder of the Session. Now is the proper time for raising this question; and we ask the Government to agree to the Motion to report Progress, in order that, with the Speaker in the Chair, we may put the question to the House.

MR. SULLIVAN: The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition has expressed his astonishment that I, who brought forward this question, did not rise on hearing the explanation of the Speaker, and express my regret at having made use of the term "one-sided." I wish to make my position in this matter clear. I desired to bring this question before the Speaker, without making any reflection upon the conduct of the young gentleman alluded to. I move in this matter entirely from a Parliamentary point of view. With reference to the remarks of the noble Lord, I beg to say that I did rise to express regret, but found that the Speaker had left the Chair. I should be glad that we should have an opportunity of discussing this question, but not necessarily immediately. And I have no doubt, if the Leader of the House could satisfy my hon. Friend that he would not be precluded from raising it as a matter of Privilege, that the Motion might be withdrawn. The question is a grave one. I believe that a precedent has been established to-night reflecting on the freedom of Parliament; but I appeal to my hon. Friends not to hasten on a discussion of the subject to-night.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: There will be no difficulty at all in raising this question in a way which will give it precedence of other questions. I believe I am right in saying that it is so. At all events, no objection will be raised to such a course on the part of the Government. I wish to impress upon hon. Gentlemen the hope that, now they understand that is to be the course taken, they will not waste time by further discussion of that point. We agree that the matter shall be brought forward as a question of Privilege, and it will, therefore, take precedence.

MR. GRAY: I think we ought to be satisfied with the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if the right hon. Gentleman will give us his assurance that the objectionable practice will be discontinued until the decision of the House be given. If that cannot be done without the authority of Mr. Speaker, then I trust that my hon. Friend will persevere in his Motion to report Progress. We have an objection to be spied upon in this way. And we are not inclined to wait until to-morrow to have this matter decided. If, however, the practice is at once discontinued, I agree that the matter should be laid before the House to-morrow, and that the Motion to report Progress should be withdrawn.

MR. O'DONNELL: I am perfectly sure that it is within the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman that a considerable body of Members of the House object to the presence of this unprecedented reporter. We trust that the right hon. Gentleman the Speaker of the House of Commons—whom we all so much respect—will withdraw this reporter, pending the decision of the House. I do not, in making this suggestion, even imply that it is wrong; but everyone will agree that it is unusual; and, pending the decision of this unusual matter, I trust that the reporter in question will leave the Benches of Members of this House.

Mr. Parnell

MR. CALLAN: I think I may ask my hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion to report Progress, for this reason—that since we alluded to the fact that the officer of this House had returned to his place I find that the official has disappeared. I suggest to my hon. Friend that the Motion should be withdrawn, on the distinct understanding that it will be renewed when next that official takes his place in the Gallery.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I have noticed that the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition has ventured to give advice on many occasions, and that his advice has been rejected. He has joined in the appeal addressed to me by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I wish to point out that I shall not accept suggestions because the Leaders on both sides of the House have recommended them. Both have endorsed the same comments, and both agree that we are wrong. But this is a question of Order. I have acted throughout—as I shall be prepared to show on a future occasion—thoroughly in accordance with precedent and strictly in Order. I have been appealed to to withdraw my Motion to report Progress, on the ground of Order. I reject that appeal, because it is recommended to me on the ground that my Motion is not in accordance with Order; but I am willing to withdraw it, because I believe it will be more in accordance with the convenience of the Committee that I should do so. On that ground I will ask leave to withdraw the Motion. But I must protest against the disorderly character of the proceedings that seem to find favour with certain hon. Gentlemen. I contend that it would have been right to have gone on with the question of Privilege. The highest authority in the House is compromised in that subject; for, without putting the Motion that “I do now leave the Chair,” he left the House. I am in a peculiar position—I have shown that, technically, I am in Order; but I think it better that the Rules of Order should be subservient to the convenience of the Committee. There has been already—or it is said that there has been—so much disorder on both sides of the House that I think we may appeal to Mr. Speaker that as this question has been raised—and it is one on which differences of opinion may arise—whether it would not be courteous to withdraw this obnoxious person until the House has assented to the arrangement? If my hon. Friends are correct in saying that this objectionable person has been withdrawn—of course, for other reasons than the considerations that have been pressed upon me, and not at all upon the ground of Order—I shall ask leave to withdraw my Motion to report Progress. It is difficult to talk to a great many persons at the same time on the same points; but I wish to point out that in asking leave to withdraw my Motion to report Progress I do so for the convenience of the Committee. I say that, because I am informed that that gentleman has been withdrawn from the Gallery; but if the gentleman re-appears in the Gallery I shall hold myself at perfect liberty to renew my Motion.

MR. PARNELL: I do not wish any misunderstanding to arise on the form in which this Motion is withdrawn. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that he believed that if the Motion were withdrawn this question could be raised at the commencement of our proceedings to-morrow as a question of Privilege. That I believe is the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed himself; but I wish to ask him, supposing his belief is not well-founded, and that we cannot raise this Motion at the commencement of our proceedings to-morrow, will the right hon. Gentleman afford an opportunity for its being raised?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir; we will give the opportunity referred to by the hon. Member.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment again proposed, in page 92, line 30, to leave out from the word “seas,” to the end of the Clause.

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

MR. GRAY: I beg leave to move that the Chairman do report Progress, as the young gentleman has re-appeared in the Gallery. So far as my powers go, I shall endeavour to prevent the continuance of the discussion of this Bill in Committee while this young gentleman remains in that portion of the House reserved to Members, and takes no subordinate place.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Gray.)

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I want to ask a question which will require a simple answer only. Sir, is any Member of this House, including Mr. Speaker, privileged to seat in this House—in the very body of this House—a stranger?

THE CHAIRMAN: The question can be easily answered. No Member of this House, including Mr. Speaker, has any power of seating a stranger in the body of the House. But the person to whom the hon. Member refers is an official of the House, and is charged, in performance of his duty, to take a place in some part of the House.

MR. SULLIVAN: May I suggest that there are parts of the House set apart for Members, and that there are other parts from which they cannot speak or vote, and that it is to the former portion that this gentleman has access. I appeal to the hon. Member for Tipperary to withdraw his Motion on that ground. I think we can better accomplish the object we have in view, and save ourselves from misconception, if we adopt the course of raising this matter as a question of Privilege; but I give fair Notice that I shall spy strangers in the Gallery so long as this young gentleman remains.

MR. O'DONNELL: Hon. Members have not touched upon one side of this question, for it should be remembered that this person is not a stranger. With great deference to your ruling, Sir, I believe the officers of the House stand either below the Chair or in the Stranger's Gallery; they might find places amongst the gentlemen of the Press, and I do not know why they might not shelter themselves in a still more sacred precinct. But we object, Sir, to this sort of reporter being placed in the seats of hon. Members. Any hon. Member who chose might take his seat in the Gallery, and those seats should not be occupied by officials of this House. If this man is still in the House, we do consider, Sir, taking the views we do, that there is very scant courtesy being shown to Members of this House. We are perfectly desirous of proceeding with Business; but after the excitement that has evidently been raised on this subject, I do think that it is surprising to find this person still taking notes of our proceedings. There are two sorts of reports—a fair official report, taken at the Table of the House, and the reports of the Press; but we do object to this amateur sort of reporting. I fully sympathize with the position taken by the hon. Member for Tipperary; and I do not think he would be doing his duty unless he persisted in his Motion.

MR. WHITBREAD: I wish to suggest to hon. Members that we should uphold our dignity in approaching this question by treating it in a calm and formal manner after fair Notice. The course of spying strangers may be open to some misconception out-of-doors, if adopted by hon. Members. The part of the House to which reference has been made has, within my knowledge, been often used by officials of this House. I can call to mind having seen the Chaplain and a number of Clerks sitting there; and I think, so far as I can see, we should not mix up any question of this sort with a really secondary consideration. As far as my experience goes, a Clerk of the House would be perfectly in Order in being there, so long as no inconvenience was caused to hon. Members. That being the case, and considering the heated character of this discussion, would it not be better for hon. Members who wish to impugn the action of the highest authority of this House to do so in a calm and temperate manner, after we have had time to consider the precedents? I do think that hon. Members would consult our dignity, if they would allow us to proceed with the Business before us. There is no question of reporting our speeches outside, or of any communications being made to strangers. The question is entirely one of Privilege, and we ought to discuss it in a proper spirit.

MR. CALLAN: We all cordially agree with the advice addressed to us by one whom we so much respect, and who is such an authority in this House as the hon. Member who has just spoken. I think it has been assumed that it is a mistake to bring this matter forward in the manner it has been without previous Notice to Mr. Speaker. I had intended to give private Notice of it; but, Sir, as attention has now been called to the matter, I hope that no hon. Member will spy strangers, but will allow our proceedings to be reported. If strangers were spied, we should be sitting here in camera—a mode of procedure we so strongly objected to yesterday in the case of even a small Committee. I hope that the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) will, however, use his influence to endeavour to obtain a discontinuance of this objectionable practice as to this young person. It is a small concession, and so eminently one of good feeling towards Members of this House, that I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer should rise in his place and add the influence of his position to ours, and join in the suggestion which has been made, that this objectionable practice should be discontinued pending the decision of the House.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I do not want to take the responsibility of initiating these proceedings. The knowledge of Parliamentary procedure shown by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) and the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), and other hon. Members, do not make me disposed to take the initiative.

MR. CALLAN: Though I suggested to the hon. Member for Mayo that he should withdraw his Motion to report Progress, in order that we might proceed to Business, pending the decision of the House to-morrow upon the point, yet I will appeal to the hon. Member for Tipperary to persist in his Motion to report Progress, even at the risk of delaying important Business, if the practice, which we cannot but regard as anything else than an attempt at terrorism, is persisted in.

THE CHAIRMAN: The word "terrorism," used by the hon. Member, is entirely out of Order, as applied to the conduct of any hon. Member of this House.

MR. CALLAN: I stated that it would be regarded as an attempt at terrorism.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that the hon. Member must withdraw the expression.

MR. CALLAN: I withdraw it; but I do feel that the person in the Gallery, spying on my proceedings here under exceptional circumstances, is a proceeding that certainly must influence me, and exercise a deterrent influence upon me in my place here.

MR. DILLWYN: I now rise respectfully to appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether it would not be desirable that he should suggest to the highest authority of the House that this person should be withdrawn from the Gallery until such a time as the House should arrive at a decision upon the matter? What is the position in which we are now placed? Circumstances have taken place, and the action of the highest authority of the House has been called in question. I am not going to state my own opinion—we shall all have an opportunity of discussing the matter at the time to which it has been postponed. The question of Privilege has been raised, and it is agreed now that it shall come on to-morrow. Pending that discussion, is it desirable that the proceeding in question shall go on? Whether right or wrong, it is a question affecting the Privileges of this House—a very serious and large question—which I do not wish to express any opinion upon now. It may prove a very serious matter to call in question the action of the highest authority of this House; and the question is one of such a serious nature that it is upon all hands agreed that we shall be acting rightly in postponing it until to-morrow. Will it not be better—as there can be no great object in continuing the services of this person—that the practice should be discontinued in the meantime? I will venture to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he would facilitate the proceedings of the House, which we all wish to do, if he will lend the great weight of his influence to the suggestion which has been made that this practice should be discontinued.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not see, Sir, in what way I can interpose in this matter. The question which has been raised was originally addressed to Mr. Speaker, and Mr. Speaker informed the House that the gentleman who had been introduced into the Gallery was acting under his orders, and that he was employed in taking certain notes for the private information of Mr. Speaker himself. It has been known, apparently, for some time, that this practice has been going on; because the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) called attention to the circumstance by a Question, and had communications with Mr. Speaker on the subject. Mr. Speaker has told us that he considers that he has authority to employ this gentleman in the way in which he has been employed. It is, as I understand, the intention of some hon. Gentlemen to bring forward a Motion to the effect that Mr. Speaker ought not to take that course, and when the time comes—as it will to-morrow—for that Motion to be made, it will be made and discussed. At the present moment, however, we are quite incompetent—and I do not think that it would be courteous—to call back Mr. Speaker to make this proposal to him. As to making such a suggestion privately, I must altogether decline to do so; for to take such a course would be to commit an imprudence. If hon. Gentlemen think it necessary to divide the Committee upon the question of reporting Progress they can do so, and it will then be seen whether the Committee desire that Progress should or should not be reported. I venture to submit that hon. Members are entirely out of Order in discussing now the details of the matter of which I have been speaking.

MR. GRAY: I wish to substitute a Motion, which I will read to the House, for the one which I have already moved. It is—

A great breach of Privilege has been committed; and it is desirable that a Member should not be liable to misrepresentation in discharging what he considers to be his duty. I think there has been a certain amount of misunderstanding on this matter; it is my belief that it was agreed on all sides that it was a great inconvenience for the matter to be raised now, and that it would be better raised to-morrow. I, for one, understood that, in the meantime, the objectionable practice would be discontinued. I find, however, that I am mistaken in that belief; and I am now desirous of placing upon the records of the House the fact that one Member of this House, at least, objects to the transaction as a breach of Privilege.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member propose to substitute this for his former Motion?

MR. GRAY: Yes.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again, in order to report to the House that an Official of the House is engaged in taking notes of the Proceedings of the Committee, without the authority of the House or of the Committee, from a place reserved for Members of the House, and that, in consequence, the Proceedings of the Committee are interfered with.”—(Mr. Gray.)

MR. O'DONNELL: While I originally agreed with the Motion for simply reporting Progress, as a protest against the continuance of this proceeding, I cannot agree to the Motion which has been now made by the hon. Member for Tipperary, for I think that Motion distinctly commits the Committee to the re-opening of the whole question which we have been considering, and upon which both sides are agreed that the consideration should be reserved until to-morrow. Although I was in favour of reporting Progress, in order to call attention to the continuance of this proceeding, I am not in favour of any further step tending regularly to re-open this question. I shall, therefore, suggest to the hon. Member for Tipperary that, in deference to the views such as we have just heard from one of the most respected Members of this House, he should not persist in his protest against the continued presence of this person, but should let us go on with the Bill for the rest of the evening. I think, however, that it is not courteous to continue this proceeding to which objection has been taken when so much has been said with regard to it. But if it is continued, we must do our best to put up with the inconvenience and proceed with the discussion.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I wish to say one or two words in defence of this unfortunate official who now remains in this House taking notes. It is his duty—he is here by the order of the Speaker; and he cannot retire without orders. But I must say this—that it is disrespectful to the House on the part of the Speaker, and after what has taken place, not to remove this person from the Gallery.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: If I may make a suggestion to the hon. Member for Tipperary it is that he should allow his Motion to be negatived. If he allows his Motion to be negatived without going to a Division, his protest will be recorded, and will appear upon the Journals of the House, and that will be sufficient.

MR. PARNELL: I think that the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer all through the proceedings has been unfortunate. If he had agreed at the commencement to allow Progress to be reported, we should have had the question decided a whole hour ago, and we should now have been proceeding with the clauses of the Bill. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer has deliberately wasted public time—an observation very frequently applied to us—we can only make the best of a bad business, and after the protest—the very proper protest—of the hon. Member for Tipperary has been placed on record, I think we shall have to submit for the rest of the evening to the inconvenience of the unauthorized presence of this gentleman in the Gallery. If we are to be afforded an opportunity to-morrow of discussing the whole question, I think, under all the circumstances of the case, we may allow the Motion to be negatived, and proceed to discuss the clauses of the Bill.

MR. CALLAN: The Government have not acceded to the course which we have suggested, and I cannot but think that the silence of the Government shows some kind of complicity on their part in this objectionable course of procedure. There are rumours afloat as to the use which has already been made of the notes taken up to this time. It is rumoured—and I wish to give public notice of the rumour, in order that, if not true, it may to-morrow receive a full and ample contradiction—that the superior authorities of this House, other than Mr. Speaker, have met and considered, and that a form of indictment has been drafted recording the number of times certain hon. Members have spoken, and stating that their conduct amounted to obstruction of the Business of the House—a course which is in contravention of the ruling of Mr. Speaker two years ago. It is also rumoured—I will not say Mr. Speaker, but that the high officials of this House have made use of these notes—I will not say that they conspired, but they have met together and consulted as to how they can best utilize the information which they have obtained from the lists that have been made, and that the form of the indictment has been already drawn up for the purpose of being utilized, if occasion shall arise. There is also a rumour that the Government have complicity in these proceedings, and also that the superior officials of the House have already utilized the information for the purpose of entrapping Irish Members into some breach of Order. Unless contradicted to-morrow, I think these rumours may be taken as facts.

MAJOR NOLAN: As this practice will probably go on until Mr. Speaker takes the Chair to-morrow, I should like the Committee to know what is really being done. I have made it my business for the last half-hour—being at liberty to go to what part of the House I like—to sit next the official who is engaged in taking notes, and to observe the manner in which he takes them. It seemed to me that his proceeding was an entirely novel one. I saw it stated in the Press the other day that certain Members had spoken so many times, and I certainly was surprised to find that I was credited with having spoken 18 times; but now I have seen how the notes are taken I can understand the matter. If, for example, the hon. Member for Meath got up to address the Committee he was credited with speaking once. If the hon. Member for Mayo got up to interrupt him for a moment and he got up again, being still in possession of the Committee, this was marked down as a second speech. You Sir, will perhaps then call the hon. Member for Meath to Order, and the hon. Member explains. This is put down for a third speech, and so it goes on. I think it necessary to point this out; because, when we are discussing this matter to-morrow, it is well that we should know the system upon which these notes have been taken for some time. I do not consider that the system upon which they are taken is a candid one. It is not a nice thing to have to go and sit next an official of the House to observe what he is doing. I have not the slightest fault to find with the official who was taking the notes, and who was, no doubt, strictly obeying orders; but the whole circumstances are unpleasant. I have, to the best of my ability, informed the Committee of what I believe is being done.

It is, however, a very miserable thing for us to have to go into.

MR. GRAY: I do not wish to occupy the time of the Committee unnecessarily, and I do not think it would be just to take a Division upon my Motion unless the Committee should desire it. If my Motion is put and negatived by the Committee it will go upon the records of the House, and I shall be quite content. I do not wish to trouble the Committee unnecessarily; I only wish to place a protest on this matter permanently on the records of the House.

MR. PARNELL: I am much obliged to the hon. and gallant Member for Galway for the information which he has given us as to the manner in which these notes are being taken. After what we have heard from him, the Committee must not feel surprised if my speeches should be considerably longer while this person remains in the Gallery than they have been up to the present time. Hitherto, I have been in the habit of endeavouring to compress my observations as much as possible. But the habit of compressing observations is, unfortunately, attended with this disadvantage—that you are liable to omit some things that you require to say, and which you are obliged to say afterwards, in answer to some false argument brought forward by the other side. Henceforward, I shall answer all arguments that may be advanced against my contention, so that there shall be no reason for my speaking a second time, and making myself liable to a charge which, I suppose, will be brought against me in what I must call a most un-English fashion.

MR. CALLAN: To-morrow we shall discuss this matter as a question of Privilege. I hope that these notes will not be used to-morrow, but that they will be left with the Librarian for our inspection. We ask for an inspection of the notes taken officially by one of our paid officials for the use of the House. Are we to have the Star Chamber back again? Are Irish Members to be prevented from seeing the official notes taken by the direction of the Speaker—by the paid officials of the House? But I will not further discuss the question now, for I am quite certain that my suggestion will be sufficient to cause these things, like the cat-o'-nine-tails—and these things are a moral cat-o'-nine-tails—to be produced. The cat-o'- nine-tails were left with the Sergeant-at-Arms for our inspection, and I ask that this moral cat also shall be left with the officers of the House for our inspection.

MR. SULLIVAN: I have listened with pain to the statement made by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan); and I can only say that if such a statement had been made in the House of Commons in the days of Pym and Hampden, I know who would be in the Tower on the morrow morning.

Question put, and negatived.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. DILLWYN said, that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) had asked a question with regard to a matter upon which it would be satisfactory that the Government should give an assurance. He asked whether, in case the Indian Articles of War should be found more stringent than this Bill, the Government would use its influence with the Indian Government in order to modify them?

COLONEL STANLEY could not answer the question at the present moment. At the same time, he had no doubt that after his right hon. Friend had inquired into the matter he would give such directions.

MR. DILLWYN said, he had the authority of the hon. Member to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. PARNELL remarked, that this question had been before the House on a previous occasion, and the hope was held out that the Government would place the Indian Mutiny Act upon the Table of the House, so that they might really know what it was.

COLONEL STANLEY: It is in the Library.

MR. PARNELL said, it had not been distributed to hon. Members. It was only right that the Act should be laid on the Table of the House.

Amendment (Mr. Chamberlain), by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL STANLEY, in the absence of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice—namely, in page 92, line 32, at end, to add—

"(8.) Any person, not otherwise subject to military law, accompanying a force on active service, who shall hold from the commanding officer of such force a pass revocable at the pleasure of such commanding officer entitling such person to be treated on the footing of an officer."

MR. PARNELL hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would have the kindness to inform the Committee who the persons were to whom the clause would apply, and what the exact position was which it was intended they should occupy?

COLONEL STANLEY said, he could not tell the hon. Gentleman exactly who all the persons might be to whom the clause would be applicable. The question was one which had, on a recent occasion, been the subject of discussion for several hours, and the Amendment which he proposed was the result of that discussion. The clause would cover such cases as those of newspaper correspondents or photographers accompanying the Army. Persons of a superior class would be treated on the same footing as officers, while others would be placed on the footing of private soldiers.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not think the explanation of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was at all satisfactory. It was now proposed to make a change in the law which, in his opinion, it was by no means advisable to introduce. Newspaper correspondents were not placed under the operation of martial law either by the provisions of the old Mutiny Act or the Articles of War, and he objected to the alteration as affecting them to which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman asked the Committee to assent. He should be glad to see the position of newspaper correspondents with the Army improved; but he did not think the Amendment would effect that object, and he should deem it to be his duty to take a Division upon it. He should like to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman whether newspaper correspondents accompanying the Army in the field were now subject to military law?

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that they did not come under the operation of the Mutiny Act, but that they were liable to be governed by the law of the camp. All, he might add, that it was sought to do by the Amendment was to place them under the protection of military law, and to give them a recognized position.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER pointed out that the Amendment would not only give those to whom it related a recognized position, but that it would enable them to draw rations and forage as officers. Under these circumstances, newspaper correspondents ought to be placed under the operation of military law. He should like, however, to ask whether the case of newspaper correspondents accompanying the Army did not come within the scope of sub-section 11 in the next clause?

MR. PARNELL, having referred to the statement of the Secretary of State for War, that newspaper correspondents were now liable to be governed by the law of the camp, expressed a wish to know what that law was? Were they under the jurisdiction of the provost marshal? The right hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to say so; but he would submit to the Committee that neither under the Mutiny Act nor any other Act was a newspaper correspondent with the Army subject to the provost marshal. When the right hon. and gallant Gentleman spoke of the law of the camp, did he mean that newspaper correspondents might be tried by the provost marshal? If so, he could only say that he doubted the accuracy of such a statement exceedingly. It had no foundation in either the Articles of War or the Mutiny Act. It appeared to him to be simply an invention of the Secretary of State for War.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! The hon. Member is not entitled to speak of a statement made by any other Member of the House as an invention. I must call upon the hon. Member to withdraw that expression.

MR. PARNELL: Certainly. His object was merely to direct the attention of the Committee to the ingenuity of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and he did not intend to use the word "invention" in any offensive sense. He was under the impression that it was a very harmless phrase; and he would point out that there had been a recent ruling from the Chair which, in his opinion, would, if strictly acted upon, very much limit the freedom of discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The expression which I called upon the hon. Member to withdraw was one in which he attributed invention to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, as applied to a statement made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman in this House. The hon. Member, in using such an expression, appeared to me to be casting an imputation on the good faith and honour of another Member of this House, the Secretary of State for War. [Mr. PARNELL: Absurd.] The hon. Member then proceeded to comment on the ruling of the Chair, and to put upon the words which he used some exceedingly remote and far-fetched interpretation. I must say that the hon. Member seems to me to be trifling with the Committee.

MR. PARNELL: I altogether deny that you are entitled to put such a construction on anything that I have said.

LORD JOHN MANNERS rose to Order. He wished to ask the Chairman whether, if the hon. Member for Meath disputed the correctness of his ruling, it would not be necessary, if the matter was to be discussed, to have the Speaker in the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: The expression used by the hon. Member to which I called his attention was not in Order, and he has no right to dispute the ruling of the Chair in the matter. He is out of Order in doing so.

MR. PARNELL said, he had done nothing of the kind, and contended that the noble Lord the Postmaster General had not the slightest ground for stating that he had disputed the ruling of the Chair; for the moment the Chairman called upon him to withdraw the word to which he objected he did so. Really, before a Member raised a preposterous point of Order he ought to be sure that he was acquainted with the facts of the case, and ought to be able to substantiate the charge which he made. He (Mr. Parnell) had cast no imputation whatever on the good faith or honour of the Secretary of State for War; and, at the request of the Chairman, he had at once withdrawn the allegation with respect to invention on the part of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, because the Chairman was of opinion that the word which was used was un-Parliamentary. He altogether denied, however, that the phrase was intended to be of an offensive character. Certainly not. He should be very sorry to use any expression of that kind with regard to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He had been a witness, a constant witness—a more constant witness, at all events, than, perhaps, any other Member of the House during the last two months—of the courtesy, kindness, and forbearance of the Secretary of State for War, and he should very much regret making any imputation against him. But he felt he must say he was excessively indignant that one of the Colleagues who sat by the side of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, who was so rarely in the House as not to be in a position to form a just opinion on the bearing of any of its Members, and who had no knowledge whatever of the Bill under discussion, should obtrude himself, as the noble Lord had done, on a point of Order which he had no justification for raising.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he must again rise to Order. The point to which he had called attention had been ruled by the Chairman against the hon. Member for Meath; and he wished to ask the Chairman whether, in his opinion, the hon. Member was justified in contesting that ruling? The hon. Member, he submitted, was out of Order in doing so.

MR. PARNELL said, he had not contested the ruling of the Chair. He begged distinctly to deny that he had done anything of the kind.

MR. J. BROWN rose to Order. He thought the hon. Member for Meath was out of Order in making any further remarks on the point. He might add that he had distinctly heard the hon. Member use the word "absurd" while the Chairman was giving his decision.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member for Meath wish again to address the Committee?

MR. PARNELL said, he would not trifle with the time of the Committee by continuing so absurd a discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have to state, in answer to the noble Lord the Postmaster General, who addressed a question to me on a point of Order, that it appears to me the hon. Member for Meath was certainly out of Order in contesting the decision of the Chair, and denying the justice of its ruling as to the un-Parliamentary character of the expression which he used.

MR. BIGGAR said, he desired to make a few remarks on the Amendment, as he supposed the point of Order which had been raised might now be regarded as having been disposed of. He could not help thinking that it was very undesirable that persons who accompanied the Army as representatives of the Press, for the purpose of giving what they believed to be a fair and correct report of what they saw, should be subject to the operation of military law. It was perfectly reasonable, of course, that such persons should be required to conform, as far as possible, to the conduct which was expected from officers and gentlemen, and that the commanding officer should have the power of removing them from the camp if they were guilty of any transgression which rendered such a course expedient. That was the course which had recently been taken by General Roberts in Afghanistan in the case of a correspondent for pursuing a line of conduct to which he objected. For his own part, he thought there was considerable inconvenience in allowing irresponsible persons to be with the Army at all; and the justice of that view was borne out by what had occurred in the instance of the Prince Imperial. But it was absurd that the agent of a London, or any other newspaper, should be subjected to military law in the way in which was proposed.

MR. PARNELL wished to point out to the Committee that the Amendment, if agreed to, would make a decided alteration in the existing law. Newspaper correspondents accompanying the Army had never hitherto been put under any description of military law. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War talked about the rule of the camp; but he must be aware that it was a rule which was never enforced, in the way that it could be, against the correspondents of the newspapers. The Amendment, in fact, was nothing more or less than an attempt to place a bit in the mouth of newspaper correspondents, and to keep them under the control of the military authorities, so that they might send home no intelligence of which the General in command did not approve, and which was not subjected to his criticism and alterations. The justice of that view was borne out by what had been done in Afghanistan, where a newspaper correspondent—who refused to do something, for not doing which the Committee was now asked to subject an offender to military law—was turned out of the camp. Well, let a correspondent be treated in that way, by all means, if his acts were of such a kind as to prejudice or imperil the operations of the Army; but let him not be subjected to a code of law which it was never intended should be applied to a person occupying his position. He should like, for a moment, to call the attention of the Committee to some of the provisions of the Bill which they were asked to extend to the case of newspaper correspondents, under the operation of military law. It was provided, for instance, that any person subject to military law who “gives intelligence to the enemy” should be liable, on conviction by a court martial, to the punishment of death; that was to say, that if a newspaper correspondent, in the discharge of his duty, unwittingly wrote anything which was afterwards published, and which, in the opinion of a commanding officer, came within the definition of “intelligence to the enemy,” the correspondent might have sentence of death pronounced upon him. Now, that he could not help regarding as a monstrous proposal. If it were deemed to be necessary that a correspondent’s letters should be inspected before they left the camp, there was ample power to exercise that supervision over them; but that a correspondent should be made liable to have the penalty of death inflicted on him, merely because he happened to have written something in one of his letters which might be held by a court martial to be in the nature of “intelligence to the enemy,” was a proposal which was perfectly preposterous. Again, the provision of the Bill that any person subject to military law who “knowingly” did anything calculated “to imperil the success of Her Majesty’s Forces, or any part thereof,” was liable to be put to death, would also apply to the case of newspaper correspondents if the Amendment before the Committee were agreed to; and the question, whether the Act complained of was or was not of the nature set forth in the Bill, would have to be determined by a court martial, who would have the power of deciding whether the letters of the correspondent of a London newspaper, written under circumstances of great difficulty, came under the operation of the sub-section which contained the words which he had just quoted. He could very well imagine that a court martial in the field might, owing, perhaps, to some spite entertained by its members against a particular correspondent, give a verdict in such a case of which they might afterwards have cause to regret. Clause 4 of the Bill also provided that every person subject to military law,

"Who treacherously holds correspondence with or gives intelligence to the enemy, or treacherously or through cowardice sends a flag of truce to the enemy," should, on conviction by a court martial, be liable to suffer penal servitude. Now, what, he would ask, was the vocation of a newspaper correspondent? His vocation was to furnish intelligence to the public, and the necessary consequence of the publication of that intelligence was that it must come to the knowledge of the enemy. In these days of newspaper enterprize, anything which appeared in a newspaper, or anything which was sent through the telegraph wires by a correspondent, must, from the very nature of the case, be intelligence to the enemy; and there was nothing said in the Bill as to the meaning which was to be attached to the word "intelligence." It was absurd, on the face of it, he contended, to subject the correspondents of newspapers, under such circumstances, on conviction, it might be at a moment's notice, to the punishment of death or penal servitude. Even Cetewayo, he had seen it stated, had all the Cape newspapers at his camp, or kraal, containing the most minute intelligence as to the movements of his opponents. Yet the intelligence thus supplied might be twisted by a court martial into intelligence given to the enemy, and the correspondent who had supplied it to the newspaper of which he was the representative might be condemned to death for an act which he had done in the ordinary discharge of his duty. Now, that was a proposal so monstrous that he hoped the Committee would not tolerate it for a single moment. It was sought to put down, in black and white, a provision in the Bill which would, he repeated, make a complete change in the law as it now stood, and which was open to the greatest objection. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said that newspaper correspondents accompanying the Army were at present subject to the ordinary law of the camp; but nobody knew what that law was. It had never been embodied in an Act of Parliament, and rarely or never been enforced against any of those persons. Of course, the officer in command had the power of turning a correspondent out of the camp if he considered that he had done something which was prejudicial to the interests of the Army; but no correspondent had ever been put to death because it was supposed he had furnished intelligence to the enemy; and there was nothing, he might add, to show that the intelligence supplied must be of a harmful character, in order to render the correspondent liable to be so punished. It was, further, provided in Clause 5 of the Bill that every person subject to military law,

"Who, by word of mouth or in writing, spreads reports calculated to create unnecessary alarm or despondency," should, on conviction by a court martial, be liable to penal servitude. But how often, he would ask, had not correspondents sent reports to the journals in London, or elsewhere throughout the country, which were calculated to create alarm and despondency with respect to the position of the Army? Did it not happen that letters of that kind were brought by almost every mail which arrived from the Cape? Were the authors of such letters, he should like to know, to be muzzled by Act of Parliament, and to be placed at the mercy of a court martial in the field? The clause was not limited in regard to time. Any man who, six months previously, had used words calculated to create alarm or despondency, might be sentenced to death. There were a variety of other offences mentioned in the clause, none of which ought to entail a punishment of this kind. The Government, instead of seeking by this section to implicate newspaper correspondents, ought to bring in a separate Bill relating to newspaper correspondents in the field; and they should take council with those officers who had had experience of these gentlemen. No doubt, there were plenty of officers who were capable of giving advice to the Government on a matter of this kind, and who would assist them in drawing up a Code of Rules for the regulation by Government of newspaper correspondents during war. In the absence of a satisfactory explanation from the Government, he should feel it his duty to divide the Committee.

MR. E. JENKINS hoped the Secretary of State for War would re-consider this clause; because, although he was not prepared to go so far as the hon. Member who had just spoken, yet he thought it would be a pity to introduce into this Act a clause about newspaper correspondents. The 166th and 167th sections appeared to him to give ample powers for dealing with all persons who accompanied an Army in the field. At present, it was admitted that, supposing a newspaper correspondent indiscreetly conveyed information to the enemy, it was in the power of the commanding officer to order him out of the camp. Then came the question, was it advisable or politic, in view of the relations existing between the Press and the public in this country—there being no doubt that the Press had done great service in exposing the weakness of military commands and operations in the field—to put a clause into an Act of Parliament which seemed to recognize the right of a commanding officer to bring these gentlemen before a military tribunal and subject them to the penalties of military law? He did not think this was a politic thing to do; and it would be far better to leave the matter in the general terms in which it at present stood in the Bill. These general powers were amply sufficient to deal with the cases which might arise.

COLONEL STANLEY: I wish, in the first place, to say, the hon. Gentleman was not in the House when I explained why, in the absence of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), I moved his Amendment. Having accepted it in principle the other night, I was bound to carry out the undertaking I had made with him. The question originally arose in this way. The Select Committee on this Bill recommended that all camp-followers, and all persons accompanying the Forces, should be brought under military law; where the offences and procedure would be specified, and the punishments limited. They would, in fact, be brought under a regular Code; and it appeared to the hon. and learned Member for Oxford and the other Members of the Committee—for I believe they were unanimous on the point—that this would be a protection to them. It was, however, suggested that a distinction should be made, and that these persons should be placed rather on the footing of officers than that of common soldiers, and in that I agreed. These persons must be under some law, or no law; and if they are brought under military law it is a distinct protection to them, and it is not unreasonable that they should be treated as officers. That is the reason why I accepted the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford.

MR. HOPWOOD said, it was quite true, in all respects, what the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had just stated. The discussion originally arose on Clause 36; and it was promised that, at a later stage of the Bill, some words should be proposed to meet the case of these newspaper correspondents.

MR. E. JENKINS asked, whether they desired to put newspaper correspondents in the English Army on a worse footing than they would be if they were accompanying the Russian Army? There was no doubt no Russian General would think of shooting an English newspaper correspondent. They all knew perfectly well that a number of correspondents accompanied the Russian Army during the late war, and that the Grand Duke, who was in command, felt aggrieved at much of the information conveyed to the public; but he did not put these gentlemen under military law. He hoped the Committee would forgive him for pressing this matter. It was one of policy and good-feeling, rather than one of mere technical rigidity. A newspaper correspondent, to a certain extent, ought to be a privileged person; but all they proposed to do in that direction was to place him on the footing of an officer, the result of which must be that he would write with a sort of cord round his neck. He was certainly not to be liable to be flogged: but he was to be liable to be sentenced to penal servitude if he committed an error. At present, if a newspaper correspondent committed an improper act, he should be treated as General Roberts treated the correspondent of The Standard, and ordered out of camp. If General Roberts had had such a clause before him as that now proposed he would have felt obliged to treat the correspondent under military law, and subject him to military discipline. Now, would it be advisable to do such a thing as that? Would it not be far better to leave the matter as it at present stood?

SIR HENRY JAMES wished it to be understood that this Amendment was not intended in any way to restrict the powers of military correspondents. It was rather intended to protect them, and give them a status which they had not hitherto enjoyed. If such a clause was not passed, these correspondents would be liable to be dismissed from the camp by any commanding officer who felt annoyed at them. No doubt, it was proposed that they should be subject to the punishment of officers; but they would also receive the protection of officers, and no commanding officer would bring them arbitrarily before a court martial. All who had the interests of these correspondents at heart would vote for this clause, because it was clearly a distinct protection which was about to be given to them.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN suggested that they should postpone coming to a final decision on the matter until the Government had communicated with the parties likely to be concerned, and ascertained what their view of the matter was.

COLONEL STANLEY could not consent to a postponement, and could not withdraw the Amendment, because it was part of the understanding that he should move it in the absence of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, the hon. and learned Member for Oxford had taken this Amendment from some words which he himself had suggested in the course of one of the previous discussions; and he suggested those words distinctly in the interests of the newspaper correspondents, and that was the direction in which he believed the clause would work.

MR. PLIMSOLL said, if the Committee divided, as at present advised, he should not know how to vote. He was extremely anxious that newspaper correspondents should receive the fullest protection whilst abroad, or anywhere else; but he thought the insertion of this clause would tend to give an officer an undue control over them, and they might incur very disagreeable consequences by speaking out fully. No doubt, it was said the clause was intended for the advantage of these gentlemen, and if that was really so he should be glad to support it; but, under all the circumstances, he thought it would be advisable to postpone the matter until they could get the opinion of those who were best able to judge whether the adoption of the clause would be to their advantage or not.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought it would be a most unusual thing to postpone the decision of the House of Commons until they had ascertained what the opinion of certain newspaper correspondents was. From an occasional reading of the newspapers, he must say he was not very much enlightened as to what was the way in which he ought to conduct himself. Therefore, instead of referring their differences to the newspapers, they had better settle them amongst themselves; because if they were to shape their conduct according to the opinion of the newspapers, they would often find themselves in a position of great difficulty. In the interests of the passing of this Bill, he protested against any postponement. The simple question for them to decide was, whether it was to the advantage or not of newspaper correspondents to be brought under the operation of military law? As things at present stood, a commanding officer might expel a correspondent from the camp; while, under the proposed new clause, it was proposed there should be power to place him under military law, and elevate him to the status of an officer. Now, for his part, he thought it would be better to let matters stand as they were now. It would be far better for a man to be expelled the camp, if he did anything wrong, than to be continually writing under restrictions which must affect his liberty of thought and action. Under the new law, the correspondent would be in a worse position than he had ever occupied before. He was not in favour of civilians criticizing the operations of commanders in the field, and he did not sympathize with fireside criticisms; but he did approve of any machinery whereby newspaper correspondents, or anybody else, would be enabled to give an independent review of military operations of which they might have no other report than that of the officers themselves. If they put these correspondents under military law, they would be entirely at the mercy of the officers.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON pointed out that this matter had already been once postponed. On a former occasion, he had pointed out that, as the Bill then stood, a correspondent was liable to be tried and flogged just the same as a private soldier, and he said he thought that an improper power to give to the military authorities. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford agreed in that, and supported the suggestion that newspaper correspondents should be omitted from the class of private soldiers; and he promised at a later stage to propose words placing them on the footing of officers, and that was the Amendment now before them, and he thought it would fully meet the case.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, such a thing as a newspaper correspondent was unknown during the Peninsular War, and their presence with an Army was of quite a modern date. The question they had to consider, therefore, was, how were military operations promoted by their presence? and he repeated that he thought the best thing to do would be to postpone the decision on the matter until the opinion of the gentlemen themselves had been obtained.

LORD ELCHO understood that if this Amendment were carried General Roberts would not have been able to act towards the correspondent of The Standard in Afghanistan as he did, and to tell him he should not be with him in the Army any longer. If that was so, he should be disposed to vote against it, more especially with reference to what took place in the War in the Peninsular. It was evident that a General must have absolute control to decide whether correspondents should or should not remain with his Army; and he hoped they were not going to do anything which would take away or minimize that power.

COLONEL STANLEY said, there must be a certain amount of give and take; and if a newspaper correspondent made his position one such as was not consistent with the public welfare, a General in command would naturally feel it his duty to request him to leave the Army. Of course, the Public Service must come first; but, subject to that, they were now going to put these persons clearly in a better position than they occupied before. He might be biassed, but he did not think correspondents could be better off than when occupying the position of a British officer.

MR. BIGGAR said, the Public Service got very great benefit from the independent comments of the newspaper correspondents. Our commissariat and transport service was in the most wretched state in the Crimea, and, but for the reports of the newspaper correspondents, would have continued so. They wanted independent reports by gentlemen who wrote of what they saw; and, for that reason, he thought it was very undesirable that correspondents should be liable to be tried by courts martial. If that were done, each man would always be writing with a rope round his neck, liable to be called before a court martial and subjected to personal inconvenience that must interfere with his independence as a writer.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE should certainly vote for the Amendment. It was a power that must be given, and nothing more.

MR. E. JENKINS could not advise his hon. Friend to go to a Division, as on this point he did not see his way to vote with him.

MR. PARNELL said, there was nothing in the Amendment to prevent a correspondent from being ejected from a camp. His proposal would not have that effect. It left to the commanding officer all the power which he originally had of ejecting a newspaper correspondent from the camp if necessary; and, at the same time, gave him, or any field officer, the power which he did not now possess of bringing the newspaper correspondent before a court martial on any of the charges which were breaches of this Army Discipline and Regulation Act. He wished to point out to hon. Members, who supposed they were doing newspaper correspondents a benefit, that they were giving additional powers to the commanding officer, and taking away none which already belonged to him. They were making these persons subject to military law; and unless they passed this clause, or passed new clauses, they would not be subject to military law. Therefore, no case whatever had been made out by the Government, or its supporters, for their contention that they were putting correspondents in a better position than they occupied before. If they wished to extend the powers of officers in this respect, they should do it, not by a few words extending the provisions of the whole Act to newspaper correspondents, but by special clauses dealing particularly with them, and then they would know what they were about. This sub-section would have been smuggled through, and nobody would have known anything about it, but for his question. Hon. Gentlemen must remember how wide were these powers. If this section were passed, they could try a correspondent for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. ["No, no!"] The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) appeared to be going into hysterics over that statement; but it was nevertheless the fact. ["Oh! oh!"] They could also try him under the Devil's Clause. That seemed to him absurd. He knew the Committee would be against him; but, so far as logic and argument went, they had proved this sub-section to be a monstrous absurdity, which ought to be rejected by the Committee.

Amendment agreed to; sub-section inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 167 (Persons subject to military law as soldiers).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON wished to amend the clause by inserting the following sub-section:—

"(12.) All civil officers who may be employed by or act under the Secretary of State for War at any of Her Majesty's establishments in the islands of Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, Sark, and Man, and the Islands thereto belonging, or at foreign stations."

He did not see why these officers should not be on the same footing that they were on in the existing Mutiny Act. He had had occasion to state, more than once, that a variety of persons were in this Bill to be tried under the operation of the Mutiny Act, who had not hitherto been brought under the operation of that law. The tendency of this Act was to draw more persons under military discipline than formerly. Here they found, however, with regard to civil officers, a contrary course had been adopted. Those officers had had the very good sense to take themselves out of the Act. The effect was, that civil officers in charge of stations could not be tried by court martial, and could only be disposed of by the civil law.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that though, technically, these civil officers had been subject to military law, that had never been enforced, and they had always been tried by the civil power. He, therefore, thought it better to put them on the footing on which they were to be treated.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought he could find cases where civilian officers could be tried by court martial. He rather thought he had tried one himself.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he would not put his experience against that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman; and if he said there had been cases he was bound to take that as a statement of fact; but he was sure it was not generally the case.

MR. E. JENKINS observed, that there was, undoubtedly, a strong feeling in the Army that the clerks at the War Office should be brought under the discipline of the Military Act; but, of course, it would not do to propose that just now.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER moved, in page 92, line 36, sub-section 1, after "all," insert "non-commissioned officers and." He did not wish to raise this question again; but he might point out that in the very next sub-section they had the words "all non-commissioned officers and men." The omission here seemed to make the clause read very badly.

COLONEL STANLEY did not think these words were wanted, as, in the interpretation, the word "soldier" would include non-commissioned officers. It was rather a matter of drafting; but if his hon. and gallant Friend would leave the matter, they would deal with it in the Interpretation Clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DILLWYN, in sub-section 3, proceeded to move an Amendment dealing with the cases when British and Colonial Forces were serving together. He thought it was very unreasonable that the British soldiers should be placed in an inferior position to the Colonial soldiers when they were serving together.

Mr. Parnell

THE CHAIRMAN: It is questionable whether this Amendment can be moved at this point. This clause only contains definitions of the meaning of different persons.

MR. DILLWYN said, if that was the opinion of the Chairman, he would ask when it would be proper?

THE CHAIRMAN said, it had better be moved as a new clause.

MR. DILLWYN said, he would move it as a new clause.

MR. E. JENKINS asked to be allowed to say that he did not quite see why this Amendment should not be moved, and he thought it would be better to take it at once.

COLONEL STANLEY rose to Order. The Chairman had ruled that this Amendment was not admissible, and he submitted that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dundee was not in Order in rising.

MR. E. JENKINS was only respectfully submitting a point, and did not intend to challenge the decision of the Chairman.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN moved, in page 93, line 20, to leave out "or their corps."

Amendment agreed to.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE moved, in page 93, sub-section 7, to leave out lines 26 to 31. The effect of that was, he said, to place all non-commissioned officers and men of the Yeomanry Force under military law. He hardly thought it was necessary, in time of peace, to place this Force under this regulation. He was afraid it would cause unpleasantness, and he did not think there was any necessity for it, as the men in that Force were usually of a superior class.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the Committee would not assent to the Amendment. It was necessary, if these Forces were called out, that they should be under discipline; and he could not conceive why the Committee should wish them to be treated in a different manner to all other Forces. He did not think the Committee would wish him to go into any arguments on the subject, for he thought it was self-evidently important that these men should be placed under military discipline.

MR. HOPWOOD could not agree that this was a matter to be settled off-hand and at once. Why were these thoroughly voluntary Forces placed under this stringent Act of Parliament? Government ought to be content with the concluding part of this clause, which placed every corps under the Act when it was on actual military service. That, he thought, was highly necessary; and that also, of course, would only be in a time of public need, which would make every man a soldier.

MR. EVANS, as a Yeomanry officer of long experience, hoped this sub-section would not be omitted. He believed he could say that both officers and men, of all things in the world, would dislike nothing more than this proposal. It would be very injurious to the corps, for it would place them in an unpleasant comparison with the Militia. Speaking from a good deal of experience, he should be exceedingly sorry to see the Amendment carried.

Amendment negatived.

COLONEL STANLEY moved the insertion of an Amendment which would have the effect of rendering members of the Yeomanry Service subject to military law as long as they were serving in aid of the civil power of the country.

MR. E. JENKINS said, the Amendment proposed was quite new, and must not pass unchallenged. No explanation had been given of the matter, which was not in the Mutiny Acts as they existed.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, he should like to observe that the Yeomanry, when they came out, were under the Mutiny Act.

MR. PARNELL said, he must object to the insertion of the words, because he thought that the Yeomanry was not a body that ought to be brought in to the aid of the civil power. They were not trained men, and were not fitted to deal with a turbulent mob. They were liable to lose their patience; and he could not imagine circumstances arising when men in their senses would bring in the Yeomanry to aid the civil power. They knew that trained and disciplined soldiers, when called upon to suppress riots, were with the greatest difficulty able to keep their temper and restrain their action. Under no circumstances whatever should the Yeomanry be brought in to cope with civil disturbances. He objected to the words sought to be inserted, not so much because they gave power to bring in the Yeomanry, but because they indicated that Yeomanry might be brought in. They had evil recollections in Ireland in connection with the Yeomanry of 1798. Nearly all the atrocities of 1798 were committed by Yeomanry. The Regular soldiers were distinguished for their quiet and forbearing demeanour; but the Yeomanry behaved in the most scandalous fashion, their atrocities being handed down as tradition. He objected, in consequence, to any sub-section bringing in such an objectionable body to the aid of the civil power.

COLONEL STANLEY thought the hon. Gentleman misapprehended the point. It was now under the Act to call out the Yeomanry. That was the law; and now it was proposed, when they were called out, to put them under the Mutiny Act.

MR. HOPWOOD rose, and was received with a groan of disapprobation from a Member opposite. He asked, whether the sound which came from the hon. Member opposite was to be tolerated to repress his expression of the views he entertained on this question?

THE CHAIRMAN called for Order, and said he had, as the hon. and learned Member must have heard, called Order to reprove the noise referred to.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he was met, on rising, by a noise which disturbed Order, and he protested against that gross breach of Order. He would now proceed. This was a most unfortunate Amendment. This sub-section was put in as a reminder to the military authorities that this was a power which not only might be called into force, but which it would be laudable and desirable to call into operation. He thought it undesirable; and he should take the opinion of the Committee on the point. He objected in toto to the calling in of the Yeomanry to the aid of the civil power. It was said—"Oh! we want to put them under the Mutiny Act when they are called out;" but why call them out at all to aid the civil power? There was no doubt this was a scheme for giving direct sanction for using the Yeomanry in aid of the civil power. Let him remind the Committee that this was one of the Volunteer Services; but they would not venture to call out the Volunteers in case of civil strife; and there was nothing in this Bill which referred to the Volunteers in the same sense. Yet there was this attempt to include the Yeomanry. So far from this being a well-considered proposal, it was clear that it had only been thought of at the last moment. He challenged the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to deny this statement.

MR. EVANS said, the Yeomanry was not a Volunteer Force in the strict sense of the term. Since he had been a Yeomanry officer, it had been found necessary to call out the Force; and he was old enough to remember, in his own county, three several occasions on which the Yeomanry were called out, and rendered very efficient service, and that at a time when the police was entirely inadequate. He could not admit what had been said of the Yeomanry was altogether justified. It was not justified so far as England was concerned—he said nothing about Ireland. He was speaking of his own personal knowledge.

MR. MACDONALD, who was met with cries of "Oh!" and other sounds, said, it struck him that some of the Gentlemen on the opposite Benches were unwell, and he might have to take the opportunity of asking that Progress be reported in order that they might have time to look to the state of their health. If allowed to proceed, he would state his strong objection to bringing in the Yeomanry to the aid of the civil power. The hon. Member above the Gangway who had just spoken said these Yeomen had rendered useful service. Well, in his (Mr. Macdonald's) time, he had seen the Yeomanry out in the County of Lanark something like a dozen times. It was said it was to aid the civil power; but the fact was, they were set to watch potato fields. Now, it was notorious that more potatoes were stolen when the Yeomanry were out than when they were not out. That was their efficiency. He had seen them out in the County of Ayr, and he did not think they were in the slightest degree better than in the County of Lanark. So far as his experience went, the Yeomanry corps was not an efficient corps, and ought never to be brought out to aid the civil power. The military was trusted and respected; but the Yeomanry was despised, distrusted, and condemned.

Mr. Parnell

MR. PARNELL said, in the absence of the Law Officers of the Crown, he wished to ask the right hon. and learned Judge Advocate General—the only learned person present on the Ministerial Bench—a question on a point of law. He wished to know whether the power of calling out the Yeomanry was a power that was given by Common Law or Statute? [An hon. MEMBER: Statute.]

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: By Statute.

MR. PARNELL: Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman would add to his kindness by informing me what Statute?

COLONEL STANLEY: The Statute of 1804.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he could not think that the Government had sufficiently considered this portion of the Bill, which, if passed into law, would have a very bad effect on the enlistment of Volunteers. That Force had been admirably successful up to the present time. It was continually increasing in numbers; and he did not think the Volunteers would submit themselves to the considerable penalties and risks involved in the clause as it was now drawn. When “on active military service,” it seemed to him, there ought to be no distinction. But it was customary for crack regiments of Volunteers to train at certain periods with the Regular Forces; and, under these circumstances, they would at once be brought under military discipline as defined in this Bill. He was, at first, afraid that the Volunteers might subject themselves to corporal punishment; but, clearly, that was not the case, for corporal punishment was only to be inflicted when the troops were on active service. That, of course, would not cover the mere calling out of the Volunteers for training with the Regulars. But they subjected themselves to very penal clauses, indeed. For instance, take drunkenness. The offender was subjected, for drunkenness, to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a period not exceeding two years. Now, he did not think that the ordinary artizan in our towns would ever join the Volunteer Force if he was aware that for yielding to temptation when off duty on one of these training occasions he would render himself liable to imprisonment for two years. In the same way, he was liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, at the discretion of the court, if he “disobeys any garrison, general, or other orders.” This was a very wide phrase, indeed; and he could conceive that some Volunteers might easily commit some slight breach of discipline, might break some order, which would at once bring them under the purview of this clause. All offences against general discipline in Clause 40 subjected the soldiers of the Regular Forces to imprisonment for two years, and the same offences would, under this clause, subject the Volunteers to the same imprisonment. This appeared to him to be a matter which had not been sufficiently considered by the Government. He could conceive of lengthened terms of imprisonment being given for, apparently, very trivial offences in the case of the Regular soldier; but he could not conceive that it was desirable to extend such power to the case of a Volunteer who had offended. Anything that would in the slightest degree discourage the Volunteer Force would be a very serious mistake. He begged to move that sub-sections a and b be omitted.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the Committee would not assent to leave out these words, because they would, practically, by so doing, repeal the Army Regulation Act, 1871. He did not think the hon. Gentleman appeared to know what the provisions of the Army Regulation Act of Lord Cardwell were. Section 9 of that Act provided—

“That any part of the Volunteer Force training and exercising with the Militia or Regular Forces, the Articles of War shall apply to them in the same manner as to the Regular Forces.”

Carrying out the spirit of that Act, he understood that the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) intended to move that when men were brought under this provision they would be given clearly to understand that they would not be brought under it without their previous consent. No harm, therefore, could possibly ensue; for, if a Volunteer did not wish it, he was not obliged to come under the operation of the Act. The Volunteer could not be placed under military discipline against his will. Well, as to the other point, when they came up for training with the Regular Forces, were they not to be brought under military discipline? Were they to place men side by side, under different regulations? He did not believe, for a moment, that the Volunteers wished to escape from military liability. So far as he had the opportunity of consulting men, he had found, so far from any indisposition to resent coming under this clause, the Volunteers, on the contrary, had a strong feeling to be placed under the same law as the Regulars. The hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs seemed to clear up the only point of difficulty—namely, that the men should know beforehand that they were placing themselves under the Mutiny Act. He did not think it necessary to take up the time of the Committee further. He wished to point out that these sections carried out the Act of 1871, and that they were in accordance with it.

MR. WHITWELL said, he could only state, from some little experience, that he had not heard a man or non-commissioned officer state the slightest objection to come under the Act under the circumstances.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that the objection to this provision was very strong, because it seriously endangered the Volunteer movement. There really was no necessity whatever for such a power as was asked for being given. Suppose an artizan in Lancashire joined the Volunteer Force, and left his home expecting to have, say, three days' outing in camp with the Regulars, and, through intemperance, or irritation by arbitrary conduct, was tempted to use language not, perhaps, quite consistent with military discipline. That man, not like the Regular soldier, trained and drilled to the control of his feelings, would then be tried by court martial; and though by the law under which he was enrolled he might get rid of his services in 14 days, he would be liable to be sentenced to imprisonment for three or six months. He thought that that was an absurdity. It ceased to be a Volunteer Force the moment they coupled it with this military enactment. It was their duty to encourage, not to discourage, the Volunteer Force to train with the Regulars; and he was sure it was not the wish of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to weaken the inclination of the Volunteers to do so. But that would be the effect if this proposal became law. It would damp the ardour of the Volunteers to act along with the Regular Forces. He thought the precaution was quite unnecessary.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON would like to know exactly how this clause would be interpreted? Would a Volunteer, each time he was called out for training with the Regular Army, have to give his consent, or would it be understood that on his entering the Volunteer Service there would be occasions when he would come under this law?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the meaning of the Amendment which he intended to move was that it should be imperative that any Volunteer, non-commissioned officer or man, should know what he was doing when he went out to join his corps in connection with the Regular Forces. It was not a question of the ordinary training or drill; but it was a question as to whether, when they joined the Regular Forces, these Volunteers were to be under an entirely different system to that of the others? His own impression was, that they would not like to be placed under different regulations. They could not make Volunteers go to Aldershot unless they chose to do so; and it was only right, when the man engaged to go and serve in conjunction with the Regular Forces, that he should know exactly what he was doing, and not be allowed to say afterwards that he had been led into a trap. It was with a view of preventing anything of that kind that he had placed his Amendment on the Paper.

LORD ELCHO apprehended that this would not affect the position of the Volunteers under the Act of 1871. Previous to 1871 the Volunteers only came under the Mutiny Act when they were called out for active service. Before that time they had been brigaded with the Regular Forces, and there had been no difficulty in maintaining discipline. In 1871, however, the feeling appeared to be that when they were brigaded with the Regular troops or Militia, they should, as far as it was possible, be placed under the same law. They could not be placed under the same law entirely, because the Army and Militia were in receipt of pay, while the Volunteers were not. In the old Mutiny Act there were fines and punishments which could only possibly be made applicable to Forces in receipt of pay, and which were utterly inapplicable to the Volunteers. The Volunteers, however, accepted the change which was proposed in 1871; and he hoped the Government would be very careful in making any further alteration in that direction, because it should be borne in mind that Volunteer officers held in their hands a power which no General commanding either the Regular Army or the Militia had, and that was the power to dismiss a man who might misbehave. While on the subject of the Volunteers, he should like to touch upon another important point, and that was how were the Volunteers to be tried? Was the court, constituted for the trial of a Volunteer, to be composed of officers of the Regular Army or of the Militia, or were Volunteer officers to be included in the judges of the court? To restrict the court to officers of the Regular Army might be a very serious matter; because, he was sorry to say, there were some military men who did not look with the greatest possible favour on the Volunteers. Therefore, he hoped the Secretary of State for War would be very careful as to making any such change; and that he would look to the constitution of these courts as being such that there would be some security that when the Volunteers had to be tried some Volunteer officers would form the court martial. This was essential in the interest of the Volunteer Force itself.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, if the Secretary of State for War was about to accept the Amendment to be moved by the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), of course the objection which he had urged would be removed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he did not intend to move the exact words which he had placed on the Paper, but other words to the same effect. What he proposed was this—after “service,” in line 42, to insert—

“Provided, That it shall be the duty of the commanding officer of any volunteer force, except when on actual military service, to obtain the consent of every non-commissioned officer and man belonging to such force before such non-commissioned officer or man shall enter on any service in which he shall be subject to military law.”

Amendment proposed,

In page 93, line 42, after the word “service,” to insert the words “Provided, That it shall be the duty of the commanding officer of any volunteer force, except when on actual military service, to obtain the consent of every non-commissioned officer and man belonging to such Force, before such non-commissioned officer or man shall enter on any service in which he shall be subject to military law.”—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. PARNELL moved that the consent of the Volunteer should be in writing, or else it might be of a very informal character.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word “consent,” to insert the words “in writing.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘in writing’ be inserted in the proposed Amendment.”

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought it might save many unpleasant questions before the court martial, if the consent of the man was produced in writing.

COLONEL STANLEY had no objection to the insertion of the words “in writing.” If the roll was called, and the man signed it, it might be useful evidence before a court martial.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 206: Majority 140.—(Div. List, No. 157.)

MAJOR NOLAN was afraid he had led some of his Friends wrong. He had told them to support Her Majesty's Government, because he understood the Secretary of State for War to accept the words “in writing;” but he found he had gone into the opposite Lobby, and had voted against the adoption of those words.

MR. PARNELL also wished to express his regret at having put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, because he did so under the impression that the Government would support the proposal which he had made. Had he known in time that they were not going to vote for it, he would not have troubled the Committee with a Division. Certainly, the Secretary of State for War said “Aye;” yet when the Division took place he voted “No.”

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he, too, had told his Friends, under a misapprehension, that they could not do better than follow the Secretary of State for War.

MR. SULLIVAN had thought he was about to enjoy the rare luxury of supporting Her Majesty's Government, when he was told the Secretary of State for War had accepted the Amendment, which it now appeared he had voted against.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER considered they were discussing a mere bagatelle. The consent of the Volunteer would have to be formally obtained, which was, practically, the same thing as obtaining it in writing.

MR. CALLAN said, he was not present in the House during the discussion; and upon asking, not how he should vote, but what was the question? he was told the Secretary of State for War had accepted this Amendment. Now the question was, did he accept that Amendment or not? If he had, why should his decision be overridden by the after-dinner audience below the Gangway?

Amendment agreed to.

MR. PARNELL moved, in page 94, to leave out sub-section 10, stating that the sub-section would have the effect of extending military law to a class of persons who had not hitherto come within its operation, and who ought not, in the opinion of many competent authorities, to be so included. For instance, if the sub-section was agreed to, wagon-drivers, whether in military service or not, would be under military law if employed beyond the seas. If military law was to be made so stringent as was now proposed, it would not be possible to induce persons to take service in such capacities as that to which he was alluding. Under existing circumstances, it was often difficult to get transport—and this had recently been the case in South Africa—but if all persons engaged in that service were to be put under military law, the difficulty would be largely increased. The plan which had been pursued hitherto had worked very successfully; and he was not able to see any reason why it should be altered, no evidence having been adduced to show any necessity of the kind.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the sub-section had been introduced for the purpose of dealing with persons who were employed in connection with the Army in a semi-civil capacity—such persons, for instance, as storekeepers, sutlers, and others, of a similar kind. Both this and the next sub-section were carefully considered by the Select Committee which inquired into the whole question, and which recommended that these persons should be brought under military law.

Amendment negatived.

MR. PARNELL moved the omission of sub-section 11. He said, the proposal of the Government would make a very extensive alteration in the class of persons who were in future to be subject to military law; and, therefore, he thought the alteration ought not to be made until after very careful and serious consideration of all the circumstances. He saw no reason why a special set of rules should not be adopted in relation to wagon-drivers, camp-followers, and persons of that kind, who ought not to be brought under strict military law, which included penal servitude, flogging, and shooting, in its list of punishments.

SIR HENRY JAMES thought this was an important question; and, on the whole, he was of opinion that camp-followers should not be subject to martial law, but should be under military law, when in an enemy's country. At the present time, camp-followers were under the sole and arbitrary power of the commander of a Force, and he might exercise that power humanely and well; but, on the contrary, he might do no such thing; and it would, therefore, be wise, in his opinion, to put such persons under military law as was proposed in the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he had intended to make a proposal in reference to newspaper correspondence published in Great Britain and Ireland; but as that question had been discussed on a previous clause he should not move his Motion, and the more so, because he thought such an account would be given of corporal punishment as would have the effect of putting an end to it altogether. There was one point, however, on which he must make an observation. Throughout the Bill it was provided that Native Indian troops should remain under Indian military law, and should not be included in the provisions of the present Bill. When, on a previous occasion, he called attention to this fact, he was met by the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) that he knew very little about it. That was perfectly true; but it was also true that the hon. Gentleman was wrong in his notion that the Indian military law was more lenient than the present law in this country. That not being the case, he thought it important that the Indian military law should be assimilated to that of this country.

COLONEL STANLEY explained, that he had no power to alter the Indian Articles of War; but he was able to say that any representation made to the Secretary of State for India would receive careful consideration.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, referring to the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), said, he had not described the Indian military law as being more lenient than that of this country. What he (Sir George Campbell) did say was that it was in advance of the English law; and in support of that view he pointed out that corporal punishment in time of peace was abolished, as far as the Indian troops, including the Sepoys in the cantonments, were concerned, long before British soldiers were exempted from this degrading punishment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he should like to know, in regard to the statement which had just been made, whether blowing Sepoys from guns—which had been done in India—was a distinct step in the direction of leniency and humanity in the treatment of soldiers?

MR. HOPWOOD said, still further security had been afforded by the fact that when the constitution of the Council of India and the powers of the Governor General in Council were fixed, a limitation was provided to the effect that no laws should be passed in India which were subversive of the Mutiny Act for England. That was a direct precedent for bringing the laws of the two countries into harmony; and, therefore, it might be fairly assumed that the authorities would insure the realization of that which was asked.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 168 (Mutual relations of Regular Forces and Auxiliary Forces) agreed to.

Clause 169 (Modification of Act with respect to Royal Marines).

MR. W. H. SMITH moved the insertion of the words—

The object of the words was that when officers and men of the Royal Marines were serving with the Land Forces they should be subject to the Marine Mutiny Act; and that when they were serving with sailors under the command of a naval officer they should be subject to the Naval Mutiny Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 170 (Modification of Act with respect to Her Majesty's Indian Forces).

MR. E. JENKINS moved the omission of all the words after “India,” in line 9, to the end of the clause. It would be within the recollection of the Committee that when the discussion took place with regard to the removal of the Indian troops to Cyprus the question was asked, under what Act the troops would come, the reply being the Indian Mutiny Act. The present seemed to be an entirely new clause; and what he wished to inquire was this—seeing that Her Majesty's Government had introduced a new policy, and proposed henceforth to assume the right to employ Indian troops outside India, would those troops, when brigaded and serving with English troops, come under the English or the Indian Mutiny Act? It appeared to him that they ought to be brought under the English Act, especially after the decision which had been arrived at with respect to the Colonial Forces; but he simply raised the question for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of State for War to make an explanation.

COLONEL STANLEY was not perfectly conversant with the Indian Articles of War; but understood, from the best information he had been able to obtain, that this clause substantially re-enacted the present law. He had no power to make any change in the Articles of War relating to India.

SIR HENRY JAMES pointed out that if the Amendment were agreed to, it would utterly break the contract of every soldier in the Indian Army.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL admitted that, at first sight, it seemed an anomaly that Indian soldiers serving Her Majesty out of their own country should be subject to a different law than was applicable to English soldiers. On further consideration, however, it would be felt that the thing was right, inasmuch as Indian soldiers had manners and customs peculiarly their own; and it would be inexpedient, if not dangerous, to put them under the same laws as applied to soldiers whose manners and customs were entirely different.

MR. E. JENKINS regretted that Her Majesty's Government had lately introduced the policy of employing Indian troops on service outside India. The Secretary of State for War had assured the Committee that there was nothing in the terms of the clause which interfered with the existing law. But the existing Mutiny Act had never contemplated the use of Indian troops outside India; and the question was, whether, if those troops were employed, say for the purpose of suppressing a rebellion in Canada, or quieting disturbances at the Cape, they would remain under the Indian Mutiny Act, or come under the cognizance of the English Act? The question was an important one; because, if the Indian differed from the English Act, there would be an unfairness with reference to the Colonial Forces who, when acting with English troops, came under the English Act, and, at the same time, remained under the Colonial Act.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the Indian troops would remain under their own Articles of War. This subject was not in any way affected by questions of policy. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) went to the very root of the matter, when he said that the Indian Articles of War differed from the English, because they applied to persons whose manners and customs were entirely different from our own.

Colonel Stanley

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) was quite mistaken in supposing that it was an entirely new thing for Indian troops to be employed out of their own country. Sixty or 70 years ago, for instance, they served in Egypt. The Colonial troops were in a different position. As most of the Colonies had independent Legislatures, there was no guarantee that they would provide an efficient Mutiny Act; but in the case of India, England could control legislation, and Her Majesty's Government would take care that the law was as it should be.

Amendment negatived.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the 4th paragraph of the present clause, and the end of Clause 42. Contrasting the two, it would be perceived that they ran on parallel lines, and as one had been left out the other ought to be. The only variation in the two cases was that different channels were prescribed for the making of complaints. He moved the omission of the paragraph he had referred to.

COLONEL STANLEY was quite ready to deal with the paragraph in the manner suggested. The two clauses ran on the same lines. He had overlooked the retention of this paragraph, and he would see to the matter before Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 171 (Modification of Act with respect to Auxiliary Forces).

MR. A. H. BROWN suggested that if a court martial should be held on a Volunteer, when the Volunteers were brigaded with the Regulars, the court should be composed of a certain proportion of Volunteer officers. Under the Bill, as at present framed, it was possible for the court to consist entirely of military officers. He would be satisfied if the Secretary of State for War would undertake to consider the matter before Report.

COLONEL STANLEY was bound to admit that the subject was fairly one for consideration, though he could not pledge himself to deal with it in the Bill. Where it was found practicable, the suggestion of the hon. Member might be acted upon; but it would be unwise to lay down any hard-and-fast line, as a prisoner might then sometimes be subjected to a long period of detention before trial. It was desired to raise the status of the Volunteers, and to put Volunteer officers on the same footing as the Regulars when serving with them; and, provided they were properly qualified, there was no reason why they should not take part in the ordinary duties of Regulars. But, of course, if this rule were applied one way it ought to be applied the other, the officers being made interchangeable.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 172 (Special provisions as to warrant officers).

MAJOR NOLAN moved the omission, from line 34, of the words "to be reduced to the ranks or." This clause gave power to a court martial, among or punishments, to reduce a warrant officer to the ranks. The power would be injurious to warrant officers, who held a very important position. There were not a large number of such officers in the Service, though in the Artillery there were many who held somewhat similar positions. They often had stores under their charge, and were jointly responsible with the commanding officer. It would be utterly ridiculous to make such men liable to be reduced to the ranks. They might be reduced to the ranks nominally, but not for the purpose of serving there. He would have no objection to the clause if it were so framed that warrant officers might be reduced to the ranks only for the purpose of being dismissed the Service or imprisoned.

COLONEL STANLEY could not speak with positive certainty; but his impression was that, practically, a warrant officer was discharged if reduced to the ranks. He would inquire into the point.

MAJOR NOLAN said, if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would consent to put in the words on the Report he would withdraw his Amendment.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he would consider the matter, and make a statement on the Report. He could not undertake to put in the words now.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 173 (Special provisions as to non-commissioned officer).

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he had proposed two Amendments in the clause, which he thought practically met the views of many Members of the Committee, and especially of several hon. Gentlemen behind him. He proposed, in page 101, line 14, to leave out "in the case of," and insert—and in line 16, before "court martial," insert "district." The effect of that would be that a non-commissioned officer could not be punished except by reduction of one grade. He proposed to leave power in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief, and of the Commander-in-Chief in India, to reduce at once to the ranks; but the reduction of a non-commissioned officer by a commanding officer would not be as it now stood in the clause. It would simply be by one grade. [Colonel ALEXANDER: That is from sergeant to corporal.] That was so. He had known cases where it was very hard to try non-commissioned officers by court martial, and yet where an officer could not pass over everything. He would accept the Amendment, giving an appeal in every case to a district court martial, and not to a regimental court martial.

"His commanding officer shall not reduce a non-commissioned officer more than one grade, and that in the case of such;"

COLONEL ALEXANDER was very sorry that, as far as he was concerned, he could not accept the proposal of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He proposed to keep the law as it now stood, and to prevent an arbitrary exercise of power by a commanding officer. He had referred back, curiously enough, to the year 1750, and found a debate then arose on the Mutiny Bill, and that Colonel George Townsend then proceeded to add a clause to prevent any non-commissioned officer being broke, or reduced to the ranks, except by sentence of court martial. They were told that certain persons attended on that occasion at the House of Commons who had been broke without trial, or without any cause assigned, and that he expatiated not only on the iniquity of such proceedings, but on the danger of leaving such arbitrary power in the hands of one individual. It did seem a curious thing that in the year 1750 a strong protest was made against such arbitrary power being committed to one person, and that now, in the year 1879, it was proposed to confer that power upon commanding officers. He could not only quote this old authority, but also a much more recent authority against the proposal—and no less an authority than His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, who was examined before the Committee which sat last year to consider this subject. He was asked by the Financial Secretary to the War Office—his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd Lindsay)—

“Would your Royal Highness think that the power given a commanding officer should be as much as that?”

That is to say, the power of reducing non-commissioned officers to the ranks. His Royal Highness replied—

“I think it should not be so much as that. I am of opinion that you ought not to give a summary power to a commanding officer to break a non-commissioned officer. It should be done by a regimental court martial, because, otherwise, you might have very arbitrary acts. I do not say it would be so. It is quite possible a commanding officer might take a dislike to a non-commissioned officer for some small matter, and if he had power to break him off-hand the result might be serious. If he was a non-commissioned officer, and particularly if he was a sergeant, I think he ought to be broken by a regimental court martial, and not by the authority of a commanding officer.”

In face of that evidence, given by no less a personage than the Commander-in-Chief, he contended that the Committee were entitled to know who were the unknown individuals who had recommended the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to take this step? If there were any commanding officers of opinion that they should be intrusted with this power, why were they not called before the Committee of last year? The right hon. and gallant Gentleman did certainly propose to make one concession, by allowing a commanding officer to reduce a non-commissioned officer only one step. He thought the concession really was not a concession at all. What the non-commissioned officer required was security in his position; and without that security the position lost more than half its value. Further, he wished to remind the Committee of what a non-commissioned officer would be liable to lose; that not only would the non-commissioned officer be liable to lose his position at the pleasure or caprice of his commanding officer, but also of an acting commanding officer. When the commanding officer went away on leave his representative at once acquired the powers of a commanding officer; that when a colonel went away, and a major was left in command, or perhaps even a captain, they would have the power of summarily reducing a non-commissioned officer from the rank of sergeant to the rank of corporal, or from corporal to the ranks. That was the power he did not think ought to be given to commanding officers. It had been stated that some non-commissioned officers turned out failures. But what fault was that? In most cases the fault was of the commanding officer himself; because non-commissioned officers were always appointed, in the first instance, on approbation to acting rank—such as lance-sergeant, and lance-corporal. While they were so acting, it was the duty of the commanding officer to find out if they were fit to be promoted either of these grades. In his opinion if this power were given, it would only encourage carelessness on the part of the commanding officer. A noble Friend near him said that the power which was made should be able to unmake. Surely that proposition, if carried out, would be a great blow at the irremovability of Judges. The Crown could make them, but it could not unmake them. They had the greatest difficulty, even now, in getting good non-commissioned officers; and if this power were conceded they would have ten times more difficulty. Therefore, unless the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would accept his Amendment, he must divide the Committee as a protest against this change. He might add that ample power was at present given in the event of necessity, in the 137th Article of War. The commanding officer of a regiment might, in a case of urgent necessity, or of proved inefficiency, apply for special leave for the purpose to the Commander-in-Chief, or the full colonel commanding the regiment, and so reduce a man. That power had worked well up to the present time, and it would be much better to leave it as it was.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he had an Amendment of precisely the same character to that which had just been proposed, perhaps he might be allowed to add one or two words to what had been said. The position of a non-commissioned officer under this clause was very unsatisfactory. They now had greater and greater difficulty in obtaining non-commissioned officers, among the young men who were now serving, in consequence of the system of short service; and it was to him inconceivable that this should be proposed. He served as a Member of the Committee which sat last year; and if there was one thing more than another which they desired to impress upon the future military law, it was that the position of non-commissioned officers should be fenced about in every possible way, and be made so secure that they might be certain that nothing could reduce them except the sentence of a court martial. The one case in which exception was made was that of the 137th Article of War, which was intended to apply to the case of a non-commissioned officer who had been promoted without sufficient inquiry into his capability, or who had subsequently been found to be totally incompetent. In such cases, generally by the consent and by the desire of the individual himself, he was allowed to retire to the ranks. That, however, had nothing to do with the proposal now made; and he must express his astonishment that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should suppose that this alteration would, in any degree, be for the benefit of the Army, or tend to raise the position of the non-commissioned officer. To his mind, it cut at the very root of that position, and rendered the rank of a non-commissioned officer insecure. It would, therefore, add to the difficulty, now already experienced, of obtaining proper men for non-commissioned officers; and, therefore, he trusted the Committee would not assent to it. The non-commissioned officer should be in such a position that, when accused of any crime, he should have a guarantee that he should only be tried by court martial, and only punished by court martial.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that that was the case now, for an appeal was given to a district court martial, and the point he particularly cared about was that a non-commissioned officer could not be reduced to the ranks altogether. He felt rather strongly upon that point. He had very often seen cases where an offence by a non-commissioned officer had been passed by, because the punishment of reduction to the ranks was really disproportionate to the offence. They ought not to pass offences over; they ought to be dealt with; and, at the same time, they ought not to be punished too severely.

COLONEL MURE observed, that it was quite true that the power of appeal was given; but, still, the clause left the non-commissioned officer in the power of his commanding officer, unless he appealed. He was a Member of the Committee which considered all these questions, and he knew how earnestly they desired to raise the status of the non-commissioned officer. He was, therefore, astonished to find, when he read this Bill, that this clause had been put in. He should really like to ask the Secretary of State for War on whose authority he had included the clause? He had no hesitation in saying that if an appeal to the Army were made the clause would be condemned. It would make it far more difficult even than it was now to get men to serve as non-commissioned officers, and he should certainly support the Amendment.

MAJOR NOLAN remarked, that this clause turned the man from a respectable soldier into a flunkey; and it would be hardly safe for him to differ from his commanding officer in religion, smartness, or anything. A private soldier was protected against the caprice of his commander, because he was protected by court martial in all matters of pay and clothing, and because he did not so much rub up against the officer; he rubbed up against the non-commissioned officer. The commanding officer depended very much on the non-commissioned officers for the smartness of his regiment, and he got very indignant if they did not follow his views. No doubt, those views were generally right; but, still, there were some commanding officers who had fads. In a good climate, where all enjoyed good health, that did not matter so much; but in a bad climate, where men got ill, the non-commissioned officers would lead a very bad life, if they did not become entire flunkies. The appeal to a court martial was quite illusory. It might be satisfactory in some gross cases; but he might say that he had known some thousands of private soldiers receiving punishment for which they could legally appeal, and yet he only knew of one case in which a man appealed, and there the non-commissioned officer was going mad. If the commanding officer, however, were merely unmerciful, it would never do for the man to appeal; for, unless he was absolutely innocent, the court martial would feel bound to support the commanding officer, and would, probably, give an increased punishment. The men did not appeal, because they knew it was not then a question of getting one, two, or three days' imprisonment, but that the court martial would give them 21 days; while the sergeant would never appeal, because he knew the sentence would be total reduction to the ranks. Besides, by this clause, they destroyed the public opinion of the regiment. At present, a man did not like to send a bad case to a court martial, and was ruled in that way by the public opinion of the regiment. It was one thing to do an act on his own authority, and quite another to submit his action to four or five other people. Besides, in some cases, the officer might decide in a pet, and when angry. The appeals then would be very few, and would give no practical control; while this clause would have the very unfortunate effect of taking away from the non-commissioned officer the idea that he had a fixed position, and of making him think he must toady his commander, or else he might get broken. Even if he did not toady his commander, the idea would get abroad that somebody else had the commander's ear, and he would toady that somebody else. If a man spent 10 or 12 years in climbing to the rank of sergeant, why should he be treated differently from the ensign or lieutenant just appointed? He might not hold quite so important a position; but he ought to have the same protection. It could not be said that the clause was necessary to deal with extreme cases, because those cases were already provided for. He would not yield to anybody in his desire to keep up the position of the non-commissioned officer; and he, therefore, thought they would do well to leave out the words "and also any officer in any case." He also proposed to leave out sub-section 2.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he would suggest to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to put in the word "colonel."

COLONEL STANLEY said, that, practically, the colonel of the regiment took action upon the officer in command of the regiment, and he imagined that that would amount to exactly the same thing as if the action were taken through the Commander-in-Chief. Perhaps that was a question which he might be allowed to reserve for the Report.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that he was very glad the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had acceded to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member opposite. He, however, was waiting for the discussion to terminate, in order to ask the Secretary of State for War when he intended to report Progress. He need not remind the right hon. and gallant Gentleman of the arduous labours the Committee had undergone since they met in the afternoon at 4 o'clock, and the very important work that would require their presence in the House at 2 o'clock the next day.

Amendment agreed to.

MAJOR NOLAN inquired whether the Secretary of State for War had made arrangements as to taking power for the convening officer to remit punishment?

COLONEL STANLEY replied that that would be done.

On Motion of Colonel STANLEY, the words "corporal punishment" were omitted from sub-section 4.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. PARNELL said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, whether he would not now consent to report Progress? ["No, no!"] In consequence of that expression of opinion, he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

COLONEL STANLEY hoped that the Committee would consent to go a little further. They had proceeded very fairly up till then; and, so far as he could see, there was every reason to believe that the Committee was disposed to discuss the remainder of the Bill in a fair spirit.

MR. PARNELL said, that Members would have to come to the House at 2 o'clock on the next day; and if they were to go on for another hour, the Government might tell them just the same thing at the end of it. He wished to know how far the Government proposed to proceed? One hon. Member said—"Finish the Bill." That was his idea. It was not his (Mr. Parnell's); and he thought they ought to understand what the Government wished to do, how far they wished to go, and at what time they intended to stop.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he hoped that, at all events, they would be allowed to proceed to the end of the Bill. He did not think it was a very great request to make to the Committee. As regarded the postponed clauses, if there were any that were not substantially opposed, he thought they might make some progress with them. At any rate, they were now on Clause 174, and he did not think there was anything that would lead to prolonged discussion up to Clause 180.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he thought the disposition shown by hon. Members opposite was really not a very fair disposition. He considered, when a temperate appeal was made to the Secretary of State for War, that hon. Members opposite ought not to shout a speaker down, and to cry—"The Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill." He apprehended that that was not the spirit in which the Government intended to deal with the opposition. He thought the statement of the Secretary of State for War was very unsatisfactory. They had made very satisfactory progress with the Bill; and he trusted that after they had disposed of the very important question they had to argue the next day—which he hoped would not take long—they would be able to proceed with the further consideration of the Bill. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not only suggested that they should endeavour to get through the remaining clauses of the Bill, but also had hinted at some postponed clauses. If that was to be the declaration of the Government, he did not see how they could answer it in any other way except by dividing on the Motion to report Progress. He was as much disposed as any Member of the Committee to take a fair and impartial view of the situation; but he, for one, could not accept that proposal. He presumed that if the majority of the Committee wanted a Division they would go to a Division; and, so far as he was concerned, he had no objection to one Division or 20; but he was prepared to go on so long as there was a prospect of making fair and intelligible progress.

MR. CHILDERS said, it seemed to him that their great object should be not to waste time. If he understood the Secretary of State for War aright, he proposed that they should go on with the Bill till they came to the postponed clauses, and then take some of the least objected to of these. He would suggest that they should not proceed with those clauses, because, if they began them, they would very soon arrive at contestable matter. He hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would accept the suggestion now held out to him, and only go through the clauses to the Schedules, and leave the postponed clauses for another day.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he thought that was a very fair proposal. As the right hon. Gentleman had pointed out, the mere fact that the clauses had been postponed showed that they contained debatable matter, and, therefore, he would not press them at that time.

MAJOR NOLAN hoped this suggestion would be acceded to by the hon. Member for Meath. He must confess that, during its progress, his mind had become very much changed towards the Bill, and he now considered it to be very much better than the old Mutiny Acts.

MR. PARNELL thought that, on the whole, they might agree to the proposal. There was no necessity for them to sit up all night discussing whether they should go on with the Bill or not. The few remaining clauses of the Bill were not very important; and as the Secretary of State for War had now conceded what he (Mr. Parnell) had asked him to do, and had said how far he wished to go, he (Mr. Parnell) could say how far he, for his part, was prepared to go. He supposed that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would himself move to report Progress when the 180th clause had been passed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 174 (Special provisions as to application of Act to persons not belonging to Her Majesty's Forces).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved to omit certain words, of which the effect would be to place civil and political functionaries, such as special Commissioners accompanying bodies of troops, under the command of the officer commanding the troops. He said it would be very startling to find that a high official of the Diplomatic Service should, under that section, and for the purposes of that Act, be under the command of the commanding officer of the party to which he was attached. He had some knowledge upon the point. He had himself been a special Commissioner, with large powers, accompanying troops; and, as he had thought at the time, in a higher position than the colonel or major, or whatever officer it was in command of the troops; and he should have been somewhat surprised to learn that he was in a subordinate position.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he did not quite like taking the words out of the clause, because, under the section, and for the purposes of discipline, would come Staff clerks and other officers not borne upon the regimental pay list. He would, however, take a note of the point raised by the hon. Gentleman, and would see whether it could be arranged upon the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 175 (Special provisions as to reserve man).

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he always looked with very great suspicion on any method of dealing with their Reserves which was not employed by Continental nations. So far as he knew, all that they did was to pledge the Reservist to keep the authorities informed of his address. So long as the soldier did that, he did not think he ought to be subject to punishment for not coming up to receive his pay.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he quite granted that they should be very careful as to how they proceeded with those men; but he thought there was nothing very unnatural in saying that a man should assign a reasonable cause for absence. As a matter of fact, a letter, or other communication, would be sufficient to assign a cause; and he was glad to find that, as the Reserve Regulations were becoming better known, the men were dropping more into the regular system.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 176 (Special provisions as to application of Act to Ireland) agreed to.

Saving Provisions.

Clause 177 (Saving of 29 and 30 Vict. c. 109, s. 88, as to forces when on board Her Majesty's ships) agreed to.

Clause 178 (Saving as to prerogative of Her Majesty).

COLONEL STANLEY asked leave to withdraw the clause, as it was proposed to bring up another in exactly the same terms as the old Act.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Definitions.

Clause 179 (Application of Act to Channel Islands and Isle of Man) agreed to.

MR. J. BROWN moved, in page 104, after line 30, to insert—

"The expression 'in the execution of his office,' as applied to an officer or non-commissioned officer, means whenever he is with his regiment, or with any regiment to which he may be attached for duty, or with any part thereof, respectively."

He said that his object in moving the Amendment was to obtain from the Judge Advocate General an opinion upon the subject of the expression of "an officer in the execution of his duty."

MAJOR NOLAN said, it seemed to him that an officer would always be in the execution of his office if this Amendment was put into the Bill, and it would be a certain protection to the non-commissioned officer as against the private soldier; but it would, at the same time, be somewhat of a hardship upon the non-commissioned officer, who would be liable to conviction for offences which would be no offence whatever, if he happened to hold a commission, or to be in the position of a private soldier. In saying this, he did not, for a moment, deny that there ought to be a difference in the punishment for offences committed by soldiers when on and off duty.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the paragraph in the clause to which objection was taken seemed to be a relic of an order introduced by the late Duke of Wellington, in reference to the time at, and during which, a non-commissioned officer was to be considered to be on duty with his regiment. He would not see that the Amendment proposed would advantage the non-commissioned officer, inasmuch as it was necessary to provide that when in uniform he must be considered to be on duty with his regiment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 104, line 32, to leave out the definition of a soldier, and insert—

"The expression 'soldier' does not include an officer as defined by this Act, but, with the modifications in this Act contained in relation to warrant officers and non-commissioned officers, does include a warrant officer not having a honorary commission and a non-commissioned officer, and every person subject to military law during the time that he is so subject."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. H. SAMUELSON moved to amend the clause by the insertion of words to except the Island of Cyprus in time of peace, in order to protect the soldiers serving there, Cyprus being, technically, a military and a foreign country.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the Amendment was not necessary, because the provisions as to military occupation did not apply to the circumstances of Cyprus.

MR. CHILDERS asked, if this was so, whether Cyprus would be considered in the light of a Colony?

COLONEL STANLEY replied in the negative, and added that though there were a few British troops on the Island it did not follow that they were even, technically, "on active service."

MR. H. SAMUELSON insisted that some words should be inserted to provide for possible contingencies in Cyprus. They had it on the authority of the Prime Minister that it was "a place of arms," for which this country paid a rent, and to the fee simple of which they had no more right than he had to a house which he hired in town for the season.

COLONEL MURE thought the question was one which required clearing up, and suggested to the Secretary of State for War that he should re-consider it, and make some proposal on the Report.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS remarked, that as his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War had stated, the question had already been considered, and no alteration in the clause was thought necessary. He would, however, undertake that the Law Officers of the Crown should be consulted on the matter between now and the Report, and, if thought necessary, words could be inserted.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN moved, in page 108, line 7, after "court," to insert—

"Or any magistrate or magistrates to whom jurisdiction is given by 'The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864.'"

Amendment agreed to.

MR. J. BROWN moved, in page 108, at the end of the clause, to add—

"For the purpose of deducting pay a part of a day shall not be reckoned as a day unless it consist of six hours or upwards."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS
(WATER EXPENSES) BILL.—[BILL 204.]
(Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Rodwell.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: I cannot expect, at the time of night we have now arrived at, to enter into a full explanation of this Bill; and I think the best thing for me to do is to move the second reading, and very briefly to state what I know the Board wish to do. With regard to my hon. Friend the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), who has removed his Notice from the Paper, I may say that, as long as I have the honour of holding the position I do, I will never again put down my name to any Bill without some consultation with the Government. With regard to my hon. Friend opposite the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), I know he objects to the expenses; but I will take care to put in a Schedule in the Bill in Committee explaining the whole matter, and I may tell my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester that a large question like this, of the supply of fresh water for the whole of the Metropolis, was very expensive, and we found it necessary to consult the best engineers and the best chemical analysts to test the various qualities of water. When we went into the question it appeared desirable to provide a double source of supply; and, after a long consultation, we found that a saving of upwards of £130,000 a-year would result from the adoption of a double supply, as compared with the cost of the necessary alterations in the existing supply. My hon. Friend wishes to make a statement, and I think I shall best consult the convenience of the House by reserving any observations I may have to make for my reply, although I am prepared to go into the whole question. I beg, therefore, to move the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir James M'Garel-Hogg.)

MR. MONK: The Amendment that I have had on the Paper for the last fortnight, or more, I removed at the request of my hon. and gallant Friend, who undertook to make a statement in defence of the action of the Board of Works in promoting the Water Bills of last Session. I am a little surprised that my hon. and gallant Friend has made so brief a statement, and one not in any way explaining the merits of the case; but as he has said he will reserve his defence, I will, as briefly as I can, state the allegations I have to make against this Bill; and I shall conclude by moving the Resolution that has been standing in my name—

"That, in the opinion of this House, no justification is shown in this Bill for the large expenses incurred by the Metropolitan Board of Works in the preparation and in the abortive promotion of the two Bills for which they ask an indemnity from Parliament."

It will be in the recollection of the House that last year the hon. and gallant Member introduced two measures into Parliament—one was introduced as a Public Bill, and the other, I believe, as a Private Bill; but I am not quite certain about that. [Sir James M'Garel-Hogg: It was so.] In the case of the public Bill the expenses ought not to have been very great; because the promoters were spared the Parliamentary fees and costs that any other town or Corporation in the Kingdom would have had to bear; inasmuch as they would have to bring in their Bill as a Private Bill; but that is a small part of the objection I have to this proposal of my hon. and gallant Friend. The Metropolitan Board of Works having brought in these Bills they were, as a matter of course, read a first time, and subsequently a discussion took place on the second reading; but I am sorry to say those hon. Members who took part in the discussion on the Water Supply last year are now conspicuous by their absence. I do not know why that is the case; but, probably, they were not aware a Bill of this importance would be brought on at 2 o'clock in the morning. I have no doubt the Metropolitan Board of Works were actuated by the best motives in seeking to provide a pure supply of water for the Metropolis; but whether they were the proper body to undertake that duty is a very different question, and one upon which, I think, it was obligatory on the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works to have consulted Her Majesty's Government. But my hon. and gallant Friend did not take that course. He introduced these Bills, and has been good enough to place in my hands the Schedule which I believe he intends to move in Committee, showing in what way those costs were incurred. Amongst them is a very large item for counsel's fees. I cannot but think if my hon. and gallant Friend had expended a small part of that sum in taking the opinion of counsel as to the legality of the proceedings of the Metropolitan Board of Works, it would have been a wiser course than that adopted; but I presume he did not do so, for if he had, he would have found out that the course the Board had adopted was certainly illegal. I am astonished my hon. and gallant Friend has not alluded to the Acts of Parliament under which the Metropolitan Board of Works were called into existence, and in which all their duties and all their powers are carefully accurately defined; but in this case, I think, he has been found wanting. If he had looked at the Acts that regulate the proceedings of the Metropolitan Board of Works, he would have seen they had no power to acquire Water Works, buy Gas Works, and initiate important schemes of that nature. In this Bill the Metropolitan Board of Works take credit for having incurred those expenses in good faith, and believing they were, in promoting the

Sir James M'Garel-Hogg

Bills, making application to Parliament for further powers for the public benefit of the inhabitants of the Metropolis. Why has not my hon. and gallant Friend given us some reason for not having consulted the counsel who are usually consulted by the Board? Why did the Board incur those enormous expenses? For, although my hon. and gallant Friend has not stated what the amount is, in the account he has placed in my hands I find the amount to be between £15,000 and £16,000, and I shall presently have to call the attention of the House to some of those items. In the first place, the amount which is paid to counsel is £1,045. Then, there are two distinct accounts; but one is of the amount paid in 1878, and the other which is paid, or payable, in the year 1879. That which was paid last year has been disallowed by the auditor, and, therefore, that payment is illegal; yet, notwithstanding that, I find in the Bill before us it is stated that questions have been raised, and are still pending, as to the legality of the Metropolitan Board of Works defraying those expenses. I ask the House, if such questions are still pending, is it not premature to introduce a Bill of this nature? I should be glad to know whether this question is still pending. Is my hon. and gallant Friend prepared to admit that the act the Metropolitan Board of Works have committed is illegal; or is he prepared to submit to a court of competent jurisdiction the question whether they were justified in incurring these expenses or not? If he is prepared to abide by the latter course, I say at once the Preamble of this Bill is not proved, and we ought not to proceed further with the Bill, at all events this evening, until the question has been decided. Now, the items are remarkable. We have, first, the amount paid to engineers, which is very small—100 guineas; but I find there is another for chemists of £1,438, and for Parliamentary Agents of £1,378. I have stated that engineers have been paid 100 guineas; but an item is still owing to them re new works and purchase of existing works, and as witnesses, amounting to £6,320 7s. 8d. I should be glad to know what are those new works which have been executed by the engineers without the sanction of Parliament? Let me remind the House that the Bills were read a first time. [Sir JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: One was read a second time.] One was, but the other was not; and it is really trifling with the House for my hon. and gallant Friend to make that remark, inasmuch as he dropped both the Bills at an early stage. Yet I find that £6,320 was spent upon works, and my hon. and gallant Friend is not justified in coming to this House and asking it to indemnify the Board for an expense of that nature. Now, Sir, I want an answer to this question. The Metropolitan Board of Works, I understand, were divided on the question as to the propriety of bringing in these Bills in 1877. I do not know—for I have not inquired—as to the number of members of the Board of Works who opposed the proposal—but I believe there was, at all events, a considerable dissentient minority. The Board of Works were warned, over and over again, that their proceedings were illegal before they brought in those Bills, and yet they persevered with them; consequently they do not come with a good grace, when they seek to saddle the ratepayers of the Metropolis with the expense. I speak on this as a public question; and I say it is not fair to seek to saddle the ratepayers with £15,000 or £16,000 in respect of schemes which they were not justified in bringing forward. Well, Sir, having done with the engineers, I find an item which has already been paid for costs—£1,438 for analysis; district surveyors, £270; Parliamentary costs, £1,378—a considerable item; maps and plans, £400; and advertisements, £1,100. What on earth were those advertisements for? I must ask the question, for I have some doubts on the subject. Were they in respect of the purchase of land for the erection of works, or were they connected with the Parliamentary requirements in reference to the Private Bill? Well, Sir, the whole of those costs amounts to £15,146. Of course, it would be a great hardship, and I do not for a moment say that it ought to fall on my hon. and gallant Friend, or on his Colleagues individually; but, collectively, I think they are liable to blame for what they have done; and I think there should be some guarantee on their part that such steps shall not be taken by them in future—at all events, they will now have received fair warning, if they go beyond the letter or spirit of their Acts, that such expenses will fall upon them. This is not the first time the Metropolitan Board of Works have exceeded their powers. Some few years ago they expended illegally some £4,000 on the erection of a pavilion and seats in Hyde Park on the occasion of a National Thanksgiving; that offence Parliament condoned; consequently, it is not with the best grace possible that they come again before Parliament to ask for another indemnity—at all events, it is a great hardship on the ratepayers of the Metropolis. The first objection I have to the Bill itself is that no sum is named in it. The 2nd clause provides that the Metropolitan Board of Works may defray the expenses incurred by their order in the promotion of the said Bills, and preliminary and incidental thereto. I object to the wording of that clause; and I do so because it asks Parliament to affirm the legality of that which is illegal ab initio. You cannot make what has been done illegally a legal act. You may condone the offence of the Metropolitan Board of Works and defray those expenses, and override the decision of the Auditors; but you cannot, even by an Act of Parliament, say what is done illegally is legally done. The costs or expenses preliminary to, and incidental to, the preparation of this Bill are to be paid by the Metropolitan Board of Works. I ask, what are the expenses of preparing a Bill of this nature? Would five guineas be the total expense? Let us know what the amount is. I object to such a clause being inserted in a Public Act, even though it is promoted by the Metropolitan Board of Works.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. MONK resumed: I shall not detain the House much longer. I wish to draw attention to the fact that no amount is mentioned; but I understand that my hon. and gallant Friend undertakes to insert in the Bill a Schedule, giving the items of expenditure in detail. He has given that promise to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), who asked for the statement. If, however, there is a question pending with regard to the legality of those expenses, I think that should be first decided. The words are, "questions have been raised and are pending." I will not press the matter further, if, as I understand, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will move to expunge those words in Committee. There is no doubt that the functions of the Board of Works are most important—they are most useful—and have been carried out with general approval. They are a very important body—at the same time a very costly body, in some respects an extravagant body—and I believe that is the general opinion of the ratepayers of the Metropolis. I am very sorry to see there are so few of the Metropolitan Members present; but the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) is present; his name I see is on the back of this Bill, and, no doubt, he will speak on behalf of the ratepayers; indeed I hope he will urge—as I have endeavoured to do—that the Board will be more careful in the future in taking steps of a similar nature. Petitions have been presented, and meetings have been held in the Metropolis in regard to this Bill, and resolutions have been passed by the Livery of the City against the conduct of the Board of Works; but I do not consider it necessary to take up the time of the House by reading them. I have raised this question as a public question, one which, I think, is well worthy the consideration of the House. I will not further detain the House, but beg to move the Resolution I have placed in your hands.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, no justification is shown in this Bill for the large expenses incurred by the Metropolitan Board of Works in the preparation and in the abortive promotion of the two Bills for which they ask an indemnity from Parliament,"—(Mr. Monk),

—instead thereof.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: I will not detain the House for more than two minutes; but as I had my name down for a short time as opposing the second reading, I wish to point out that I was fully justified in withdrawing it, in consequence of the full statement of the hon. and gallant Member, that he will undertake not to put his name to any Bills like those of last Session in the future without the consent of Her Majesty's Government. These Bills have cost the ratepayers some £16,000. They cost the Water Companies—although they combined with a view of reducing the expenses of opposition—some £11,000; and that money, therefore, has been simply and entirely wasted, because of those Bills having been brought in. The second Water Supply Bill was only brought in by a majority of 3—on the Metropolitan Board the numbers being 20 to 23—and on the 8th of December, when the draft was brought before the Board, the Preamble was only carried by 5—the numbers being 12 to 17, I think those circumstances fully justified me in putting down the Notice of opposition to the second reading of the Bill. The statement, however, of my hon. and gallant Friend, that he would not apply again in this way, has justified me in withdrawing it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think it would be desirable some considerable reduction should be made in the recitement of the Preamble, and I should propose to strike out a considerable portion of it. I should also strike out "now pending," and add, at the end of Clause 2, "that such expenses be duly audited." I give Notice of those in Committee, and, with that qualification, I think we may agree to the second reading; but, at the same time, I think it is a matter in which they have exceeded their powers.

MR. LEEMAN: When the Bill is known throughout London—which I expect it will be after the discussion of to-night—there will be a strong opinion against it. It is idle, at this time of day, for the Metropolitan Board of Works to tell the people of London that they could not know they were doing that which was an illegal act. Sir, it happens in the country, when public Bodies like Municipal Corporations take upon themselves to exceed their powers, they are visited—and I do not see why the Metropolitan Board of Works should be placed in a different position—with the consequences, and could get no bill of indemnity such as this. I object to this Bill; and I am quite certain, when it is known throughout London, the people of London will set their faces most strongly against it. I, for one, will divide the House on this question, and will not allow it to pass the second reading without a protest.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am not aware why the hon. Member for York should speak for the ratepayers of London.

MR. LEEMAN: I have been for years a ratepayer of London; and on that ground, if on no other, I am entitled to enter my protest against this Bill.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: As a Representative of a London constituency, I have a right to support this Bill; and if the House think well to go straight to the question, or ask why these Bills were introduced last year, I may say it was because the people of London are poisoned by the water supplied by the Water Companies, and wronged by their charges. There is the strongest feeling against the treatment the people have received at the hands of the Water Companies.

MR. BARING: I wish to say it will be a very wrong thing to pass, at this hour of the night, a Bill for the allowance of such an expenditure by so important a public body, which ought to have availed itself of the means it had to get proper legal advice.

MR. ONSLOW: I hope the House will pass this Bill. These Bills were brought in—I may say it was almost the result of that Committee on which I have had the honour of sitting—namely, that on the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, for, though we did not go into the question of the supply of water for domestic purposes, we could not help seeing that the water supply of the Metropolis was in a very bad state. It should also be remembered by the House that the expenses for consulting the most experienced engineers are very heavy, and that the Metropolitan Board of Works have to find the best help they can among the civil engineers, and, as we all know, they charge a very high price indeed for their professional services. I am not interested in any gas or water shares, and, at the present time, I am not a ratepayer; so that I can speak perfectly independently from the facts brought before me when I sat upon that Committee, and I hope that the water supply of London, by some plan or other, may be improved. I hope the House will agree to the passing of this Bill, as I think it is perfectly necessary.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: I think I may appeal to the sympathy of the House in the course I have taken in bringing my case before them. I was perfectly prepared to enter fully on the whole question; but I refrained from doing so at so late a hour. As to the legality which has been questioned, allow me to ask the House to have patience, and hear the 144th Section of the Metropolis Management Act, which is as follows:—

“The Metropolitan Board of Works shall have power to make, widen, or improve any streets, roads, or ways, for facilitating the passage and traffic between different parts of the Metropolis, or to contribute and join with any persons in any such improvements as aforesaid, and to take by agreement or by gift any land, rights in land, or property, for the purposes aforesaid (or otherwise) for the improvement of the Metropolis, on such terms and conditions as they may think fit; and such Board where it appears to them that further powers are required for the purpose of any work for the improvement of the Metropolis or public benefit of the inhabitants thereof, may make applications to Parliament for that purpose, and the expenses of such application may be defrayed as other expenses of the said Board.”

We have been for the last 23 years doing our best for the good of the Metropolis; we have, by our action with regard to gas legislation, been the means of improving the quality and reducing the price of gas; we have done, year by year, all we could to improve the general condition of the Metropolis, and the auditor has passed the accounts. There has never been a single question raised as regards the power of the Board to promote Bills, until the present occasion; and it is by no means clear that the decision of the auditor is right. We have had counsel's opinion, and there is great variance in the views expressed on the subject; but, in order to set the matter at rest, we thought it right to come to Parliament for an Act of Indemnity; and I hope, next Session, Her Majesty's Government will introduce a Bill for the purpose of letting us know what our powers really are.

MR. BOORD: I wish to explain the reason for my vote. I shall vote for the Bill; and I shall do so because I understood the hon. and gallant Member has promised that such a thing shall not occur again. I think the Metropolitan Board are a very extravagant body; and though they do some good, they do that good in a most extravagant and costly manner.

COLONEL MAKINS: I wish to refer to one remark of the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke). He says the water of London poisons the persons who drink it. Whatever else the Water Companies have done—whether they have robbed and poisoned the people or not—they have done all they could—they have carried out their bond; and I think it is a strong way of putting things, when they have done all they could, that they should be accused of robbery and murder.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 37; Noes 12: Majority 25.—(Div. List, No. 158.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time and committed for Monday next.

MR. MONK: I wish to ask my hon. and gallant Friend if, before Monday, he will place on the Paper the Schedule which was asked for by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson)?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: The Schedule will be put in the Bill.

MR. MONK: Unless the Schedule is placed on the Notice Paper, I beg to give Notice that I shall move that the Bill be committed on that day three months. I do that because the hon. and gallant Member gave a distinct pledge that he would place the Schedule in the Bill.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: I said I would have it put in the Bill.

MR. MONK: Then I withdraw my Notice.

House adjourned at Three o'clock.

THE CATHEDRALS COMMISSION—CONSTITUTION OF THE COMMISSION.
QUESTION.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether there is any objection to amend the Royal Commission on Cathedrals, so as to include in the number of the Commissioners the Visitor of each Cathedral in turn as well as the Dean and one of the Canons, when the statutes of the Cathedral are under consideration?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD said, he had considered the proposal of the most rev. Prelate. It appeared to him that the Royal Commission would be perfectly competent to deal with all the circumstances involved in the subject of their inquiry. In fact, to deal with those circumstances was the principal reason why the Royal Commission had been recommended. He might say, generally, that it appeared to him that the Ecclesiastical and Cathedral interests were sufficiently represented; and, therefore, though with regret, he must decline to recommend any modification of the Royal Commission.

ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR SCOTLAND—THE EARL-DOM OF MAR.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY (Lord MELDRUM): My Lords, I rise to call attention to the recent election of Representative Peers for Scotland at Holyrood, and to ask Questions relative to the Earldom of Mar Peerage. At the outset, I must say that the recent election at Holyrood was contrary to the spirit and the letter of the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords which has been before your Lordships. The Earldom of Mar, as your Lordships are aware, is involved in great mystery. I am not going back to the Dark Ages, which some historians say the title springs from, but will only refer to the present generation, and I hope I shall be able to make myself perfectly clear. Before describing the election proceedings, I will shortly call to mind how the question is raised, and how it has stood since the Report of the Committee of 1877. The late Earl of Mar, who was also the Earl of Kellie, died in 1866, and Mr. Goodeve Erskine, who had always been recognized as the heir through the female line, became Earl of Mar; whilst Colonel Erskine succeeded to the Kellie title through the male line—and it was in this manner that the two titles became separated. Lord Mar voted repeatedly at Holyrood, and this was protested against on one or two occasions. A very curious thing occurred in the General Election of 1868, when there was a double return. The noble Lord's father and Lord Rollo were elected, and neither of them could take their seats in this House, because, if this had been done, there would have been 17 instead of 16 Representative Peers. In 1869, the late Lord Kellie petitioned the House to amend Lord Mar's vote; but instead of proceeding with the Petition he withdrew it. After Lord Kellie's death, the present noble Lord presented a Petition to Parliament claiming the title of Mar. The present Lord Mar opposed the claim. The matter came before your Lordships' House; and, after a considerable time, the Committee of Privileges decided, on the 25th February, 1875, that Lord Kellie had made out his claim to an Earldom of Mar dated 1565. On the following day there was an Order transmitted to the Lord Clerk Register, which had an important bearing on the case; and at the next election of Representative Peers there was considerable disturbance, there being two Earls of Mar present, and so unseemly were the proceedings that they ended in a great deal of rather undignified conversation. The Lord Clerk Register would not hear the Earl of Mar; but no one protested against him. After a few months had elapsed, the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Buccleuch) brought forward a Resolution on the subject, to the effect that at the meeting of the Peers of Scotland, assembled by Royal Proclamation for the election of Peers, the Lord Clerk Register or the Clerk of Session should call the title of Mar on the roll of Peers according to the Resolution of the Committee of Privileges on the 26th February, 1875. The noble Duke moved that; and I moved the Previous Question, maintaining that it was impossible to alter the Union Roll, where the date of a Peerage had been fixed by the Act of Union and the Decreet of Ranking. The question was referred to a Committee, and I think it was the opinion of the majority of the Members—and I can safely assert that it is the almost unanimous opinion of the majority of Scotchmen—that you cannot have tampering and tinkering with the deed Roll of Peers. The Committee declared that the ancient Earldom was on the Union Roll, and that Lord Kellie had not got it, but a Peerage dated 1565, which was not on the Roll, and which was given him by the Committee of Privileges. They did not recommend any Order on Lord Kellie's Petition, but left the Statute of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 52, to provide for any future claim. I have now given a brief resumé of the history of these two Peerages. And now I will come to what occurred the other day at Holyrood. The Roll of Peers of Scotland was called, and the moment the Earldom of Mar was called, the Earl of Kellie answered to the title which was called out as it stands on the Roll. His vote was protested against by two noble Lords present this evening, and by about nine or ten Peers by proxy; but his vote was, as far as I can learn, received and accounted for. What, under the circumstances, has the Clerk Register done? Has a certified copy of the whole proceedings been submitted to the Clerk of the Parliaments? Under the 3rd section of this Statute it was enacted that if at a meeting for the election of Representative Peers a protest against a vote be made by two or more Peers present, the Lord Clerk Register shall forthwith transmit to the Clerk of the Parliaments a certified copy of the whole proceedings; and I want to know whether such a certified copy was made, and what it is the intention of the Government to do in the matter? If the proceedings have been submitted to the Clerk of the Parliaments, this House may order the claimant to come forward and establish his claim. On this question we are in a painful and peculiar dilemma. In the first place, the Committee of Privileges have decided that Lord Kellie does not hold the Peerage which stands on the Roll, but has got a Peerage dated 1565; he tenders his vote, and it is recorded. So the Lord Clerk Register is in this predicament—he has either accepted a vote from a Peer holding a Peerage which is not on the Union Roll, or he has allowed a Peer to vote for a Peerage under protest of two Peers present, without transmitting a Report of the proceedings to this House, and in defiance of the decision of the Committee of Privileges affirming that the Peer in question has not made good his claim to that Peerage. That is an awkward predicament, and it is an important question for the Peers assembled at Holyrood to know whether a vote should be recorded or whether the Union Roll should be altered or not. But the Lord Clerk Register has done even worse than this. He has actually received the vote of a Peer who is under attainat at the present time. I must go back again slightly to prove this to your Lordships. When Mr. John Francis Erskine, in 1824, appealed to the Crown to be restored to the titles of honour of his grandfather, who died in 1715, that Petition was referred to Sir John Copley. The Law Officers of the Crown inquired into the matter, and reported upon it. Mr. Erskine was the grandson of Lord Mar, who used the title in 1716. His mother, Lady Frances Erskine, was the only child of the attainted Earl who had issue, and she married her cousin, who afterwards became heir male of the family. But this is the most important point in the whole discussion. When it was referred to Lord Lindsay to decide whether Mr. Erskine had proved his right to the title of Earl of Mar, he distinctly reported in favour of Mr. Erskine, ignored Mr. Erskine's father, and as for the male heirship, only mentioned him as the legal husband of Lady Frances Erskine. The Law Officers of the Crown also reported that the grandson of the attainted Earl had made out his title and proved his pedigree solely through his mother. Therefore, he was restored, and placed on the Union Roll above the Earl of Rothes. It was clear that any other Earldom of Mar, except the one restored through the female succession, could not have been excluded from the attainat. The Peer holding that title, dated 1565, is still under the "ban;" but he votes as the old Earl of Mar on the Roll, and holds a Peerage by a Resolution of the Committee of Privileges, which was not included in the dignities restored by the Crown under the Report of the Law Officers in 1824. What I want to know is this. Can the Lord Clerk Register call the new Earldom of Mar, dated 1565, in any place on the Roll, when the Report of our Committee says that order of precedence on the Roll has never been altered? We distinctly proved before the Committee that there was no precedent for any alteration. You can put a Peerage up; but there is no precedent for bringing a Peerage down. Ought not Lord Kellie to be prevented from voting for a Peerage which the Committee of Privileges have decided against him; and from tendering his vote for a Peerage not on the Union Roll, and which is under attain, if it exists at all? I bring the subject forward without any wish to open up sores which I hoped long ere this had been healed. A General Election may, I believe, take place soon; and what will be the result then? There will be strong protests against the Roll being received. I appeal to the Lord Chancellor to get us out of this muddle. I have no desire to disturb the harmony usually existing at the election of Scottish Peers; but there is clearly a flagrant violation here which should be put right, and I shall continue my protests against any Peerage which does not exist being on the Roll.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Lord communicated to me two Questions which he proposed to put to me, and I will answer them to the best of my ability. I have no intention whatever of following the noble Lord in the range of discussion upon which he has entered. I cannot imagine what possible object the discussion can have in this House, after the decision at which the House has arrived. I will state the two Questions which the noble Lord put to me, in order to make the matter intelligible. The first Question, as I understand it, was, Whether the Lord Clerk Register was right and justified at the recent election at Edinburgh, when the Mar Peerage was called in the course of calling over the Roll—was he justified in receiving the answer to this Peerage from the noble Lord the Earl of Mar and Kellie? All that I have to say upon that subject is this—that the Peerage on the Roll which is called the Mar Peerage is not the Peerage which has been attached in this House to the Earl of Mar and Kellie; and, therefore, the Earl of Mar and Kellie should not be allowed to answer in this call. Now, as to the Resolutions of your Lordships' House, I have no right to interpret them; but I will state what I understand they mean. In 1875, the Committee of Privileges made a Report to the House on the Peerage to the effect that the petitioner, Walter Henry Earl of Mar in the Peerage of Scotland, had made out his claim to the Earldom of Mar created in 1565, and ordered that at future meetings of the Peers of Scotland assembled under Royal Proclamation for the election of a Peer the Lord Clerk Register do call out the Earl of Mar according to his place on the Roll, and that the Peer called at such election should receive for the county the vote of the Earl of Mar claiming the vote, and permit him to take part in the proceedings of such election. Now, the Roll of the Peers of Scotland is a public document, and in that Roll there is only one entry of the Earl of Mar. It may be in its right or wrong place—I cannot say anything about that—it is there, and it is to that that this Resolution must have necessarily referred, and there is nothing else for the Lord Clerk Register except to call, and when he is called, he is told he is to receive the county vote. I do not see how any question can arise as to the duty of the Lord Clerk Register. The Order of your Lordships pre-supposes that he is to call the title of the Earl of Mar. The second Question is this. Protests were entered, as I understand, at a recent election against what was done, against Lord Kellie being allowed to answer to the call of this Peerage; and the noble Lord asks, Whether the Lord Clerk Register ought not to have referred the whole proceeding to the House of Lords, in pursuance of the Statute 10 & 11 of the Queen? This is rendered plain by the words of the Statute. The Statute says—

“That if at a meeting for the election of a Representative Peer any person shall appear and vote, or claim to vote, in respect of any title or peerage on the Roll, and if any protest is made by two Peers present, the Lord Clerk Register is to transmit to the Clerk of the Parliaments a certified copy of the whole proceedings, and the House of Lords may order the person, whose vote or claim has been protested against, to establish the same before the House: but if he does not appear, or fails to establish his claim, the House will order that his vote shall not be received or counted at any future election.”

The Earl of Mar should have been called upon to establish his title here; but he has never done so. If there is to be a protest entered against any person who has not established his title, that protest is to be set forth, and the House of Lords may call upon that person to establish his title. These are the answers which

I should respectfully offer, and I do not desire to take any further part in the discussion.

LORD BLANTYRE: My Lords, on the death of Alexander Earl of Mar, in 1435, Sir Robert Erskine claimed the Earldom through his wife, and assumed the title. His successor, Thomas, first Lord Erskine and second Earl of Mar, was dispossessed of the Earldom in 1457 by the Assize of Error. The succeeding Lords Erskine never ceased to claim the Earldom; but it was retained and enjoyed by members of the Royal Family of Scotland. In 1565, John, fifth Lord Erskine, and properly sixth Earl of Mar, obtained a re-hearing of the case, when he clearly proved his rights and was reponed by Queen Mary in the Earldom, restituit per modum justitiæ. The common sense view of these facts is, that the Queen restored to the Erskine family—who had possessed the Earldom for 22 years, 1435-57, were then deprived of it, but on a new trial in 1565 established their right to it by female succession—that which they claimed, and did not create instead a new Earldom confined to heirs male only. On these grounds, I hold that the decision of the House in favour of there having been a new Earldom created in 1565 was erroneous; that there had been all along one Earldom, which should have been awarded, not to the Earl of Kellie, but to Mr. Goodeve Erskine, the heir by female descent.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES): It appears to me an extraordinary thing to attempt to resist the decision of this House upon a point which no other body but the House can decide. By the Union with Scotland the Peers of Scotland are placed in precisely the same position as the Peers of England, and there is nothing which the Peers of this country can hold more dear to them or more important than that this House shall be the sole judge as to whether they are entitled to their honours or not. The question of this Peerage was gone into in the fullest possible manner, and none but those who have gone into the whole case and investigated all the evidence brought forward are really competent to pronounce an opinion upon it. To pick up small matters from other authorities than those which were brought before the House is not a fair way of discussing the question. The place of the Earldom of Mar on the Union Roll is that given to it by the Decreet of Ranking which took place in the time of James VI., in the year 1606. That Decreet of Ranking is by no means perfect. On the contrary, it has been open to dispute from the first down to the present time. At the time of the Union what happened in this matter? On the production of the Roll the Earl of Sutherland took notice in the House that there was pending between him and the Earl of Crawford some dispute about precedence, and that there were others of a like nature; and, in 1707, the list of Peers was laid upon the Table, and the same was ordered to be entered on the Roll of Peers with this salvo—that whereas there were several Protests entered on the Records of the Parliament of Scotland in relation to the precedence of Peers, such Protests should have the same force as if they had been entered on the Roll of Peers, or in the Journal of the House—thereby recognizing its authority over these disputes with regard to precedence; but the House has never altered any of the places on the Roll, although, by the clearest evidence, proved to be wrong. Very soon after the Union in 1707, the Duke of Ormonde claimed the Peerage of Dingwall, which was not on the Roll. He claimed to be placed on the Roll immediately after Lord Madderley, and the matter was referred to the Committee of Privileges, and the Committee of Privileges reported that he ought to be taken next before Lord Cranstoun. The difference was that that gave to Lord Dingwall higher right than he claimed. Therefore, the House obviously has the power of determining where the Peers should be placed on the Union Roll, when not already upon it. With regard to the question of what is called the ancient Earldom of Mar, the precedence which was given by the Decreet of Ranking was not that of the ancient Earldom of Mar; and no one can say that the ancient Earldom of Mar is the one placed on the Union Roll by the Decreet of Ranking. From 1377 down to the present day no one has been received as representing the ancient Earldom of Mar, either in the Parliament of Scotland or in the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The date given to the Earl of Mar by the Decreet of Ranking was that of 1457, and he was placed between Lord Rothes, created 1558, and the Earl of Errol, who was created in 1452. But, in the Decree of Ranking, no dates were given; the Peers were merely placed in their several places without giving specific dates. But it is most important to note that the place he was put in was 1457. The decision of the Decree of Ranking turns on the documents laid before the Commissioners by the Peers themselves; and of these, the most important documents were the surrender of the territorial comitatus of Mar in 1404 by Isabella, who was the neice of the last heir male, and who was, no doubt, his heir general; and returns showing that the Earl of Mar was her heir general. The Commissioners for the Decree of Ranking refused to admit that the comitatus surrendered by Isabella had a peerage Earldom attached to it, and they did not, therefore, give a precedence of 1404, thereby declaring that that surrender and re-grant did not contain the Earldom. It was a surrender of the territorial comitatus only, and they would not give him that precedence. And I would remark on this that in the elaborate protest made by Lord Crawford at the last election, he declared that the precedence that was allowed by the Decree of Ranking was a precedence of 1404. Now, my Lords, the precedence was not given of 1404, but of 1457. I would also remark that Lord Mar did not bring before the Commissioners for the Decree of Ranking the Charter by which the territorial comitatus was restored by Queen Mary to his father; but he gave these other documents, evidently desiring that by their allowing him precedence on the date of that surrender and re-grant to Isabella they would acknowledge his right to the Peerage, which he, of course, might then contend she inherited. Now, the question is, why was the precedence of 1457 given to him by the Commissioners? I hold it to be a distinct proof that they were determined that by no act of theirs would they recognize the existence of the old Earldom of Mar. Nobody would pretend that that was the date of the ancient Earldom of Mar, the last heir male of which died in 1377. James II. created one of his younger sons Earl of Mar. Therefore, there was an Earl of Mar in 1457, and if anybody claims under the finding of the Decree of Ranking, that is the Earldom of Mar which would make their title good, because that is the only one which is at all connected with the one that appears on the Union Roll. The report of those who gave judgment in the late case was that the Earldom of Mar had been a new creation from the time of Queen Mary, and that no other Earldom of Mar was then existing. That was proved, I say, by the extinction of that Earldom for 500 years, during which time no person has been acknowledged in Parliament as holding the ancient Earldom. Therefore, that the entry of the Earldom of Mar in 1457 was an erroneous entry everybody will admit, whichever way their opinion may be. There is no doubt that the Earl of Mar in James the VI.'s time desired to make good his claim to the ancient Earldom, and he put in those documents, and kept back other documents that might have induced the Commissioners, if they had had them then before them, to give the real date—namely, the date of the year in which he was created. My Lords, if every Peer is to determine whether the judgment of this House is right or not, and to act upon his own idea in a decision of this kind, confusion of the most unfortunate character must necessarily arise. The decision of this House is that the vote of the Earl of Mar is to be received when that Earldom is called on the Union Roll; the House never having as yet altered the placing on the Roll, although found to be incorrect; and if Peers individually are allowed to come forward and say—"We do not approve of the decision of the House in this matter," there will be very objectionable proceedings from henceforth in the election of the Peers for Scotland. My Lords, I think there was great reason in the Motion made by the noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleuch), who proposed that there should be an alteration in the placing of that Earldom; at the same time, there is no doubt, if you once begin altering the Union Roll, there are so many errors in it, that claims would be made for the alteration of precedence, and they would be such as to give the greatest possible trouble and inconvenience to the House; and, therefore, it may be desirable to allow the Peers to be called in the wrong place rather than take the trouble of altering their place. Now, my Lords, I would just mention what occurred in regard to a Peerage that was restored some time ago—that of my noble Friend Lord Balfour of Burleigh. That is a Peerage which, I think, it has been proved to the House was created in 1607; and the findings of the House with regard to the placing of Lord Dingwall were that he was created in 1609; they also found that Lord Cranstoun had been created in 1609—a little later—and they put Lord Dingwall before Lord Cranstoun; and in putting him before Lord Cranstoun they put him before Lord Balfour of Burleigh, who stood between Lord Cranstoun and Lord Madderley. Therefore, I say, the confusion you would get into if you once began altering the Union Roll would be very great. The Decreet of Ranking was all done with regard to the whole Scotch Peerage in a very short space of time—in about a year—and it was done entirely upon whatever documents the Peers themselves might think fit to produce; while the evidence before the Committee of Privileges in the Mar case was of a very different and much larger character. My Lords, having taken part in that judgment, and taken great pains with it, I say that all the Lords who took part in it declared it to be their opinion that when Lord Erskine was created Earl of Mar there was no Earldom of Mar in existence to which he could have been restored by Queen Mary; and if anyone has complaint to make that Lord Mar is not entitled to the place given to him upon the Union Roll, the only Peerage he can claim on the date given by the Decreet of Ranking must be that Peerage which was granted by James II. to one of his younger sons, who died without issue in 1479.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY: I must say, my Lords, that I was not prepared to hear the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees speak in such contemptuous tones of the Decreet of Ranking. He informed us that it was, in fact, a simple declaration made on the production of the best documents which the Peers at that time could produce. No doubt they had to produce what documents they had; but I think I can tell you something about the Decreet of Ranking. The Peers of Scotland in 1606 were for the first time ranked by order of the King under the Great Seal, and the rank there established indicated the place on the Roll in which the particular Peer's name was entitled to be, and, of course, his precedence; but there was a provision in it by which a Peer could obtain a higher rank by the production of more ancient documents—and

I may say that the Earl of Mar produced documents showing a descent from a maternal ancestor 100 years before Queen Mary's time. I am not going into the question as to which documents are most reliable; but I ask the House to listen to me while I show your Lordships that this House, in fact, is not a competent tribunal to determine the rights of Scotch Peers—for, by the Treaty of Union of 1707, it was expressly provided that the judgment of the Court of Session in Scotland with respect to disputed peerages would be final. My Lords, the judgment of the Court of Session was obtained in the year 1626; and, therefore, I say that in any case such as this tried by the Court of Session before the Act of Union it is not competent to your Lordships to reverse its sentence. But, moreover, my Lords, it has been stated on the highest authority that the Report of the Committee of Privileges is not a judicial proceeding—it is a mere expression of opinion—and I do not think even my noble Friend at the Table (the Earl of Redesdale) will controvert it, seeing that it was so stated by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, and also by Lord Chelmsford in 1876, who distinctly enunciated the principle that the opinion of the Committee of Privileges was simply a Report to your Lordships' House, and not a judgment given by your Lordships' House as a judicial Court. I understand, indeed, that Resolutions found upon the Report may be submitted to Her Majesty, and Her Majesty, as the fountain of all honour, may adopt it, and thus give a final decision. But in this particular case what was done was done—for some unexplained reason, the moment the Report was made and the Resolution passed it was sent off to Edinburgh, without there being any opportunity to show it to the Sovereign, and the Lord Clerk Register was directed to place the name of the Earl of Mar on the Roll of Peers in the position in which it stands—thus reversing the decision already given previous to the Union; and that, my Lords, I say it is not competent to your Lordships' House to do. Then, my Lords, I think it is plainly proved that the ancient Earldom is still in existence, and traceable in family succession through the female line. It is true that the Earldom was for some time attainted; but it was restored in 1645 by Queen Mary. But that, my Lords, was a new creation; and, therefore, Lord Kellie has no right to be placed so high on the Roll as he is. It was attained by Act of Parliament and restored, and by a judgment of the Court of Session in 1656, it was formally declared that the ancient Earldom of Mar was still in existence, descendable through the female succession to heirs-general, that the heirs had been temporarily deprived through illegal seizure and usurpation in 1457, but that these wrongs were redressed in 1645 by Queen Mary, whose charter restored to the heirs of the said Countess Isabel and their heirs-general hereditary the ancient Earldom, and which charter included the dignity, patents of honour independently of lands being unknown till many years afterwards. There really was no dispute in Scotland as to the right of the Earl of Mar whose name was in the Decreet of 1606, and who was placed upon the Union Roll. But by the decision of the House of Lords on the 26th February, 1865, they declared that Lord Kellie had made out his claim to the Earldom of Mar, created in 1565. But in doing that the House of Lords carefully abstained from making any reference at all to the more ancient Earldom of Mar held by Elizabeth, Countess of Mar, in her own right in 1404. Therefore, I contend that there is no adjudication whatever against the more ancient title. I hope, my Lords, your Lordships, who have been very generous indeed to the Earl of Mar, will not forget the maxim—Be just before you are generous. I do not ask you to be generous to Mr. Erskine, but simply to be just.

LORD SELBORNE: As I understand the law, claims to Peerages are to be investigated in a certain prescribed manner, and not argued and debated by the whole House. Therefore, whatever may have been the position of this Peerage in former times, or whatever may be the interest felt on the subject in Scotland, it is impossible that any advantage can arise from a discussion like the present in this House. I should say the same thing if it were a question concerning an English or an Irish Peerage; but the case is still stronger as to a Scotch Peerage; the manner of proceeding in that class of cases being regulated, not only by custom, but by statute. Your Lordships appointed a Select Committee last year, upon a Petition presented by the noble Earl opposite; and that Committee reported that nothing could be done in this matter, unless some claim to the ancient Earldom of Mar should be made and protested against at an election of Representative Peers, in which case the mode of proceeding, prescribed by the Act of Parliament, must be followed. I altogether fail to perceive the reason for which the noble Earl at the Table (the Earl of Redesdale), instead of being content to rely upon the decision of this House in 1875, has chosen to argue the whole case upon the merits. If I were to hold myself at liberty to follow him into that argument, there are some things which he has said, with which I, certainly, should not agree; but, so far as the title of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Mar and Kellie) is concerned, the House has already given its decision, and that decision has the force of law. It has decided that a Peerage of Mar was created by Queen Mary, and that the Peerage so created belongs to the noble Earl opposite; but it has pronounced no judgment, either affirmative or negative, with respect to the ancient Earldom of Mar. Whatever may have been said by any learned Lord in the Committee of Privileges is a matter wholly different from the Resolution of the House affirming the right of the noble Earl to the Peerage of Queen Mary, but without asserting that the old Earldom was extinct. Consequently, anyone who at the election of Representative Peers claimed the old Earldom of Mar would be entitled to produce any evidence he could in support of that claim; and it would be for a new Committee of Privileges to determine whether anything was added by that evidence to the materials, on which the former decision proceeded; and, if not, what degree of weight ought to be attributed, as against the new claim, to all or any of the reasons which were assigned for that decision by any of the Lords who concurred in it. In the present case, as in another to which their attention has been recently called, the House ought not to review and debate a legal determination.

INDIA—THE BRAHMIN KISHEN DUTT.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, I would commence by stating that I believe the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook) was ignorant of the act of illegality which I am about to relate to your Lordships, until he saw the Notice which I have put down. There has been an infraction of the liberty of British subjects, for a Brahmin is as much a British subject as any man born in this country; and when Paul of Tarsus claimed the rights of Roman citizenship, neither Festus nor Agrippa sought to diminish those rights by casting in his teeth that he was a Jew. Great complaints are now made by many writers of what they call Imperialism—that is, of arbitrary acts—and Imperialism of this kind is not so much after the model of that of Julius or Augustus Cæsar, as that of Domitian or Caligula, and acts such as this will go far to do away with the effects of the recent speech at Sheffield of the noble Viscount. This has been an act of tyranny so purposeless that it cannot be explained; but I have found a clue in a recondite maxim of antiquity which was placed before your Lordships a few nights ago by a noble Lord opposite—Quid leges sine moribus. Of what avail are the British Constitution, Magna Charta, or Habeas Corpus, against the morality of officials? The Brahmin, Kishen Dutt, had an estate in the district of Gorruk-pore. A nephew of his defrauded him of it; he first attempted to effect a substitution of names in the register, through the native Tehsildar, who repelled his proposals; but he afterwards succeeded in the English Local Court and the High Court of Allahabad. Confident in the justice of his cause, Kishen Dutt determined to seek redress from the Privy Council, and to carry out his design he pledged his wife's jewels. At Bombay, he went to the office of Nichol and Co., for his passage to England; he had not sufficient money, but a benevolent old man looked at his papers, and said that it was very plucky of him to go to England, and he should go, and he gave him what was wanting of the passage money and 20 rupees besides. The captain of the steamer was a humane man, who knew some Hindustani, and he was very kind to Kishen Dutt, who was only a deck passenger, and sheltered him in bad weather; he directed him to the Strangers' Home, in Limehouse, where he arrived on the 7th February, 1878. When there, all he could say was that he wanted to go to the Privy Council; accordingly, he was put it into an omnibus, and, unfortunately, was directed to the India Office. Thither he went fruitlessly, many days, with his papers; one day a Parsee lawyer offered to take up his case for £50; but he had spent all his money, and had been deprived of his estate. Another day, Sir William Muir spoke to him, and took his papers, and said he would examine them. Some little time after that, in the forenoon of April 4, 1878, he was told by the steward or policeman at the Stranger's Home that the Queen had sent for him, and that he must make haste. He wanted to put on his best clothes, but the people began collecting his things, and he began to suspect; "the Queen," he said, "does not want to see my old rags." However, he was told he must go; he refused, and clung to the bedstead, and had to be led out by a policeman. He said—"I cannot go without my papers." His papers were then given back to him by the policeman; he was put into a cab, and taken on board the Queen Anne steamer. Here, again, he bewailed his hard fate of being put on board without provisions; for when he left India he had laid in a supply of parched corn and dates, and he would lose his caste. This captain, also, was a humane man, and he allowed him to go ashore again, under the care of one of his men, to get some dried fruit. The steward of the Strangers' Home remained by till the ship sailed to see him off. He was thus kidnapped, and forcibly deported from England to Calcutta. Undismayed, however, he begged his way back, and got first to Aden, and from there to London to the Strangers' Home, on the 3rd September, 1878, and renewed his search after the Privy Council. At length, he found a friend who assisted him to draw up petitions to the Privy Council, and to get them presented. The time in which an appeal could be made had expired whilst he was being deported; when he returned to the threshold of the Privy Council he had been 19 months' travelling, yet the Judges of the Privy Council stretched a point in his favour, and he got leave from Sir James Colville, Sir Barnes Peacock, and Sir Robert Collier, to be heard on Saturday, June 14th; but, as both the First Court and the High Court had been agreed as to a matter of fact, the Privy Council could give him no relief. At this time he was refused any more food at the Strangers' Home, and he would have starved, had not his friend, Mr. Meakin, supplied him with dates and French plums; but after two periods of five and six days—11 days in all—of this diet, and getting no cooked food, he became so ill that Mr. Meakin would have removed him to his own house, but he was too ill to be moved. Thereupon, Mr. Meakin told the officials of the Strangers' Home that he would hold them responsible if the man died, and they relaxed their severity, and gave him food to cook; but he did not recover his strength till the 28th or 29th of June. Now, when this story was first told me, I was incredulous that such a thing could happen in England, and I should not expect your Lordships to give it credence had I not heard it myself corroborated by the officials of the Strangers' Home. I went there with Mr. Meakin on Monday, June 30th, and heard it corroborated that it was by orders from the India Office that Kishen Dutt had been shipped to Calcutta in the Queen Anne; and, worse still, that it was by their orders that Kishen Dutt's rations had been stopped, in order to drive him away. I also learned that orders had been given to shut up Kishen Dutt, and prevent his going about; but this order had not been carried out. Now, under what law or statute does the India Office carry away suitors from the doors of the Privy Council when they are open to them? By what law does it give these illegal orders to a charitable institution, and prevent its feeding the homeless? The last annual Report of the Strangers' Home bears on its covers the words, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers;" and the accounts show that £879 16s. 3d. were given to it by charitable subscribers last year; but the back of the cover of the Report has the words, "No one can be admitted into the Home without payment." Well, the publicans would do as much. I do not mean the licensed victuallers; but, in the original sense of the word, men who are not expected to make any profession of religion. If any stranger has a claim on the charity of this country, surely it is one who, relying on the justice of this country, has come so far, and at the cost of so much hardship, to seek the reversal of an iniquitous decision. I will now read to your Lordships a note from the Strangers' Home, showing that the India Office paid £15 for Kishen Dutt's passage by the Queen Anne, as follows:—

"June 18, 1879.

"From Strangers' Home for Asiatics,

"Limehouse,

"To E. E. Meakin, Esq.,

"22, Fenchurch Street.

"Sir,—I waited to hear the result of Kishen Dutt's appeal to the Privy Council before replying to yours of the 11th instant. Having now heard that the Privy Council have rejected his case, I write to inform you that the India Office paid the £15 for his passage to Calcutta, but nothing for his board and lodging at the Home, and will do nothing further for him. This man has been nearly a whole year on the funds of the Home, which is out of all proportion to our experience in other cases, and the Board cannot spend more of the funds upon him, and especially as he is not one of the class whom we can provide employment for on board ship. Nothing short of a passage paid for him would meet his case, and the Home was not intended to do this; and, besides, we do not know that he would accept a passage, and, indeed, he had one provided for him in vain. We see no termination to this case; and in the present depressed condition of the shipping trade we have many men of the class the Home was specially intended for thrown upon it, destitute for various periods; but all these we can, sooner or later, dispose of properly, by obtaining employment for them at wages to return to the East. The case of Kishen Dutt is one we cannot aid or dispose of in any way, and too much has already been spent upon him, and all in vain. This Home is not intended for the permanently destitute Natives of the East, but to aid those who are temporarily so, and are willing and able to accept employment when it is provided for them. This is what Colonel Hughes, honorary secretary, wished me to say to you by way of information in the case of Kishen Dutt.

"Yours faithfully,

"J. FREEMAN, Superintendent."

And now I have to ask, What was the object of this persecution of an old Brahmin, 70 years of age, by the India Office? Were those officials unaware that, since the Proclamation of the Queen as Empress, every suppliant for justice in India, from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin, has a right to come to the doors of the India Office with his Petition?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, the Strangers' Home to which the noble Lord had referred was, he believed, one of the best institutions in London. A great number of Asiatics came over to this country, some of whom, on their arrival, were unfortunately neglected by those who brought them here, and the authorities at the Strangers' Home did what they could in the circumstances to assist them. It constantly happened that the India Office was asked to assist these poor people to get back to India. The Brahmin, Kishen Dutt, was said to be an old man, 65 years of age. He came over to this country with some purpose connected with an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and had been received into the Home. He (Viscount Cranbrook) had a letter from Colonel Hughes, dated the 10th of March last, in which he stated that the Brahmin in question had come to the Home, and that on being informed by those whom he consulted that he had no case to lay before the Privy Council, he expressed a wish to return to India, but that he had not the means of paying for his passage. The application was submitted to the Finance Committee of the Council of India, who recommended a grant of £20 out of the Compassionate Fund. That recommendation was approved by the Council, and the money was forwarded to Colonel Hughes for the purpose of taking this man back to India. That was all the India Office knew of the matter. It was not an uncommon thing for Asiatics to come to this country in the belief that grievances of which they complained, and which could alone be determined by the Courts of Law, would be redressed on the presentation of a Petition to Her Majesty in person. It was most important that these persons should be kept from any such delusion as that. Some of them had had to be watched by the police to prevent them from forcing themselves into the presence of Her Majesty.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND)
BILL—(No. 134.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE rose to move, as an Amendment, that the House do resolve itself into Committee that day three months. As their

Viscount Cranbrook

Lordships all knew, on Tuesday, a Bill endowing the Roman Catholics with money derived from the Surplus Fund of the Disestablished Church of Ireland might have been carried by acclamation, so unanimous seemed to be the opinion of the House. That was a marvellous change of opinion since a few short years, when, but for the dexterous guidance of the noble and learned Earl (the Lord Chancellor), a large majority of their Lordships would have thrown out the Bill for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church. He supposed the change arose from the enlightened progress of modern thought. To his narrow vision it seemed like the blind and dangerous progress of a runaway horse. The past history and the present action of the Roman Catholic Church throughout Europe, equally with its present action in Ireland, were ignored or forgotten. Their Lordships cast aside experience and trusted to theory. The Protestant principles, on which the Constitution was founded, and which so long guided this nation in the path of glory and honour, were now mocked at as vulgar; and this was all the more strange when it was remembered that the question of taking education out of the hands of the Roman Catholics was one which occupied the attention of almost every nation in Europe. In Roman Catholic France, Belgium, Italy, Austria; in Germany, Russia, Holland, with their mixed populations; in Canada, in the United States, in Roman Catholic Brazil, the struggle to keep education out of, or take it from, the hands of the Roman Catholic Church was being fought; and why? Not for any purpose of religious persecution; not with any desire to interfere with the religious faith of that Church; but because the Roman Catholic Church taught that her authority was supreme, independent of and above the State. But all history showed that unless the supremacy of the State was asserted, liberty, order, and good government must become subservient to religious tyranny; for an Infallible Church must consistently teach and practice intolerance, she must and did teach every one to be an obedient Catholic first, and, subject to this condition, a good citizen after. To keep the youth of the country from thus being brought up in antagonism to the civil power, in antagonism to their fellow-countrymen, that question was now the standard round which all Liberals, save a few English aristocrats in Europe and America, rallied. Therefore, he could not but think it one which well-deserved the attention of their Lordships. The action of the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland at the present time was matter of notoriety. They claimed and exercised an influence in the appointment to every law office in the country, from the Lord Chancellor to the lowest turnkey. They dictated to the constituency what Members they were to return to Parliament—the Galway election showed how they enforced their commands. In Canada, at the last election, the Roman Catholic Bishop issued public directions to his clergy not to give the sacraments of the Church to recalcitrant voters. In Ireland this was not done by such public manifestoes; but altar denunciations against all who displeased the clergy were the constant practice, and were frequently a source of danger to the persons denounced. They claimed that where the majority were Roman Catholics, without regard to merit, all public officers should be Roman Catholics. Why was it, he would ask, that this general feeling through Europe existed against placing education in the hands of the Roman Catholic clergy? It was not attributable to any wish to persecute Roman Catholics or to interfere with their faith, but because they taught that the Roman Catholic Church was supreme above the law. While such a doctrine was preached—a doctrine so dangerous to civil order—the influence of the law must be maintained by not leaving education in their hands. With reference to the eloquent appeal which had been made the other night by a noble and learned Lord (Lord O'Hagan) as to conceding to the conscientious views of Roman Catholics in Ireland the means of separate education, he (Lord Oranmore and Browne) contended that this was beside the question—it was a mere stepping-stone to power—the claim was only a new development of the claims of the Roman Catholic clergy, for they felt that if the youth of Ireland were educated out of a particular groove they would lose their power over them. Their Lordships were not to think that any measure was really necessary to satisfy the consciences of Roman Catholics. If they accepted that principle, where were they to stop? The present Pope refused to have any relations with the Italian Government because they tolerated other religion! They had gone very far and very fast since the Church Bill had passed through the House. Let the House look back a little. At the time of the Emancipation, Dr. Doyle and Daniel O'Connell gave evidence strongly in favour of mixed education. Within a few years, and for a considerable time, Archbishop Murray aided in carrying out mixed education as an active member of the National Board. Their consciences were not disturbed, nor were they worse Catholics than the hierarchy or laity of the present day. Was not this claim, then, no part of religious teaching, but an Ultramontane development for the distinct purpose of gaining greater power? It was making religion a stepping-stone to power. Was not the passing of any measure aiding separate education a wrong not only to the Queen's Colleges and Trinity College, but to Liberal Roman Catholics, who preferred education at these Colleges, or to choose the places and persons by whom their sons should be educated? This Bill would, by the power it would give the Roman Catholic clergy, bring all liberal Roman Catholics in subjection to their iron sway. Then as to National Education having become denominational, he entirely denied that that statement was borne out by the annual Returns. Those Returns showed that where the population was mixed there the schools were mixed. It was certain that grants had been made to schools which were conventual if not monastic; and he did not think that any sensible Protestant would like to send his children to such establishments, whatever might be the conscience clause put on the chimney piece. Doubtless, in so far, grants had been made to Roman Catholic teaching which were refused to Protestant schools. He would also ask their Lordships to remember that large grants which had been made before the National system existed to Protestant schools had since been withdrawn, and that Maynooth had been for many years supported out of the funds of the Protestant Church. It was urged in support of the Bill that the Roman Catholics laboured under a grievance; but the grievance referred to was one of their own making. All the advantages which were open to other denominations in the country were open to them. At Trinity College, and all the English Universities, all tests had been removed, and for the very purpose of putting the Roman Catholics upon an equality with the others. The Queen's Colleges were open to, and accepted by, every other denomination, and every other denomination had a minister paid for religious instruction; so, also, could the Roman Catholic University appoint a chaplain. He believed, indeed, that a very large proportion of those who did require University Education had accepted the teaching of both Trinity College and the Queen's Colleges. Therefore, he contended that there was no requirement for this additional University. Where Roman Catholics had not already accepted the teaching of Trinity College and the English Universities, now that the endowments were open to them, he felt sure they would do so. If that House passed a Bill granting separate teaching through a hierarchy the result would be to put a penalty on all liberal-minded Roman Catholics. They would be doing an injury not to those Colleges only, but to every man who was inclined to take advantage of the facilities they offered. In fact, they would be putting the Roman Catholics altogether under the sway of the ultra-Romish party. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had said that the reason Trinity College was not available for the Roman Catholics was that the examinations were in the hands of those in whom the Roman Catholics had no confidence. The noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) had said the same. It was, therefore, evidently intended by the Charter, by the constitution of the Senate, to transfer the examinations to parties in whom they did have confidence, the University would be made entirely Roman Catholic, and would not be in accordance with the principle which had been adopted for a great many years. He doubted also whether the public, or, indeed, some of their Lordships, understood the Bill. He brought forward his Motion because he thought there was no need for giving further University Education in Ireland, and because the Bill would injure the existing Universities and assist Roman Catholic Universities in oppressing the liberal Roman Catholics.

Lord Oranmore and Browne

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months").—(The Lord Oranmore and Browne.)

EARL GRANVILLE: I cannot support the Motion of the noble Lord. I stated, on the second reading, my reasons. I agree with all the non-official Peers who have debated this subject that the Bill is perfectly inadequate. But as the Government adopted the novel plan of announcing in the House of Commons that they would make a clear and distinct explanation of their views on the Irish University question by means of a Bill introduced into the House of Lords, I think it is desirable that the House of Commons, where the majority of the Irish people interested in this question is so much more largely represented than here, should have an opportunity of fully considering the plan. But as to this plan I desire to make an appeal to Her Majesty's Government. The noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) is reported to have made a speech the night before last, in which great heat and eloquence, courage and much imagination, a supreme contempt for his political opponents, and unlimited admiration for the best of all possible Governments in the best of all possible cities, seemed to combine all the elements necessary for a successful electioneering after-dinner speech. The noble Marquess is reported to have described the Government policy with regard to legislation as one which, as far as efficiency would allow, made the smallest possible change. I am bound to say that, omitting the proviso, this Bill is an admirable type of such legislation. But as for efficiency, can anyone pretend that it is so after the debate on the second reading, when not only Liberal Peers and Roman Catholic Peers, but the Protestant Irish supporters of the Government, unanimously gave their opinion that the Bill was inadequate—when the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated that the Irish Roman Catholics considered it a grievance that they alone were without pecuniary assistance in higher education—and when the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack at last held out vague hopes that next Session, or the Session after the next, the Government would consider the question of supplementing the present Bill by to which he did not define? With regard to the claim of some pecuniary assistance, there is no doubt that the Irish Catholics are united with their clergy. But there is one reason for the claim which is probably not so much felt by the clergy as by the laity. Some of the latter complain that without pecuniary assistance they are condemned to Collegiate Education exclusively conducted by priests; that learned lay Irish teachers, just as much as their unlearned fellow-countrymen, desire to teach, and generally, like them, have numerous families; that they must be paid for their services, and that cheap university instruction can only be obtained from the clergy, who, from their vows of celibacy and from the character of their profession, are satisfied with very small allowances. With regard to this question of pecuniary assistance, it has been stated in the House of Commons in this House—hitherto without any contradiction—that the Irish Government did communicate last winter to the Irish Bishops for their approval a scheme resembling in its general outline the Bill introduced some weeks ago by O'Connor Don. The Government have been much pressed here to explain in what way the principles of the Intermediate School Act of last year, proposed by them and cheerfully assented to by us, are not applicable to Collegiate Education in Ireland. The Lord Chancellor gave us the reasons—and when he gives reasons they are likely to be the best that can be found—no one is so likely to find better. His reasons are these—first, that the children in the schools are younger than the students in Colleges; secondly, that there is no Conscience Clause applicable to Colleges; thirdly, that the Colleges cannot like the primary schools, be inspected. As to the first reason—namely, as to the age of the children—this may or may not be a question of convenience; but as a question of principle, it has nothing whatever on the matter. I believe there are several Irish schools of a denominational character which have survived, or, at all events, will receive, their endowments under the Government Act of last year out of the surplus provided by the Church Act. Then, as to the Conscience Clause, the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, speaking with great authority, said there would be no objection raised to it; and my noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon) reminded the Government of what they must know, that the Irish Bishops had agreed to a Memorandum to that effect. It is not likely that the Catholic laity would object to having a Conscience Clause when the Bishops are ready to agree to it. Then about inspection. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon) asked the pertinent question, whether Her Majesty's Government had not omitted to take any power of inspection over the intermediate schools? To this there is only one possible answer—in the negative. I am entitled to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they can give any more satisfactory explanation of the distinction between the principles they so successfully adopted last summer, and those which more or less they seem to repudiate this year? The noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack most properly stated on the second reading his determination only to argue his case in the manner most likely to promote the settlement of the question. I trust that I am doing nothing inconsistent with the most sincere desire that this important question should be settled if I make an appeal to the Government on this occasion. It is perfectly clear that this Bill will not settle the question. It is not reasonable to expect that it will be accepted, after the Government have themselves owned that it requires to be supplemented, and yet only hold out hopes of the necessary supplement being considered by the Government at some future and undefined period. Her Majesty's Government promised the House of Commons to give in this place a clear and distinct statement of their pledge. I venture to appeal to them to fulfil that pledge, and spontaneously to add to this short Bill those provisions which they think necessary for its complement, or, at all events, to make a statement which will enable us, and especially the people of Ireland, to judge whether such provisions are sufficient or not.

On Question that ("now") stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the Affirmative.

House in Committee accordingly; Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received on Monday next.

OFFICERS ON HALF PAY—THE CIRCULAR LETTER, MAY, 1866.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD TRURO asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the Circular Letter of May, 1866, did not guarantee to officers promoted on half-pay the same advantages in all respects as officers placed upon half-pay by reduction, and whether such guarantee has been adhered to in every case, particularly with reference to payment of over-regulation money? The noble Lord said, the Question might appear a very simple one to answer; but the matter it related to seriously affected certain officers of the Army. The effect of the Circular Letter to which his question referred was to place officers who were on half-pay by promotion upon precisely the same footing as officers who were upon half-pay by reduction. It was because in some instances the assurance contained in the Circular Letter had not been completely carried out that he put the Question which stood in his name upon the Paper. In anticipation of what the answer of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for War might be, he wished to state that there were cases of officers who had not received, prior to the abolition of Purchase, their over-regulation money from their regiments. The solemn pledges given in the House of Commons by Mr. Gladstone, Lord Cardwell, and Captain Vivian, of the same nature as the guarantee which, in his opinion, the Circular Letter of 1866 contained, should, he thought, be redeemed.

VISCOUNT BURY said, Her Majesty's Government fully intended to do every justice to the officers in this matter. The Circular Letter of May, 1866, did guarantee to officers promoted on half-pay the same advantages as officers placed upon half-pay by reduction, and everything promised in that Letter would be granted. It, however, did not contain, and could not have contained, any reference to over-regulation money, which was abolished in 1871, and which, in 1876, was illegal and not recognized by the authorities.

QUESTIONS.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON AGRICULTURE.—QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will be prepared to recommend that among the members of the Royal Commission about to be appointed to inquire into the condition of Agriculture, one member at least should be a skilled trader in Foreign grain?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, as the composition of this Commission is under the consideration of the Government, I cannot answer the Question of my hon. Friend precisely; but I can assure him that his suggestion, and others that may be made, shall have the careful consideration of the Government.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—THE FUNERAL EXPENSES.—QUESTION.

MR. BURT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the arrangements for the funeral of the late Prince Louis Napoleon will involve an expenditure of public money; and, if so, whether a Vote will be submitted to the House on the subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, there would be no occasion to submit to the House any Vote of public money in respect of the arrangements referred to. There might be some small expenditure for ammunition and for the use of a vessel for the conveyance of the Prince's remains to this country. The expenditure would, however, be very slight, and no Vote would be submitted to the House.

CYPRUS—PUNISHMENT OF GREEK PRIESTS—THE PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers relating to the misconduct of certain British functionaries in the cases of two Greek Priests in Cyprus will be laid upon the Table?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I have consulted my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in reference to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, and I have to state that we are waiting for further Reports from the Government of Cyprus on the subject. When the Papers are complete, they will be presented to Parliament.

ROYAL CONSTABULARY (IRELAND)—THE TOWN INSPECTOR OF BELFAST. QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is the case that the town inspector of the Royal Irish Constabulary at Belfast has recently been suffering from serious pulmonary disease, and that he has latterly been obliged to absent himself from his duties for a considerable period; whether it is true that he has been in active service for forty-seven years; and, having regard to these circumstances, how much longer is it intended to ask him to continue to occupy the office of town inspector?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I have received a Report from the gentleman referred to, which will, no doubt, give the hon. Member satisfaction. It is not a fact that he was suffering from pulmonary disease or any other complaint. He informs me that he never was better. He was absent on urgent private affairs. There is no intention to interfere with his office.

IRELAND—THE ALLIANCE AND DUBLIN CONSUMERS' GAS COMPANY—THE ELECTRIC LIGHT.—QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, Whether he is aware that the Alliance and Dublin Consumers' Gas Bill was allowed to pass through this House containing clauses which confer, directly or indirectly, powers of Electric Lighting on the Alliance and Dublin Consumers' Gas Company, notwithstanding the recommendation contained in the Report from the Select Committee on Lighting by Electricity, that—

“Gas Companies, in the opinion of your Committee, have no special claims to be considered as the future distributors of Electric Light;”

whether he has any objection to state the circumstances under which the Bill containing such powers was allowed to proceed; and, whether he will now, or when the Bill comes back to this House, take steps to have all such powers expunged?

MR. RAIKES: Sir, in reply to the first part of the Question of the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan), I have to say that when the Dublin Consumers' Gas Bill passed through this House, it did not contain any direct clause conferring the power to which he refers. I may further state that the Bill was read a third time, and left this House upon the 9th of June; whereas the Report of the Committee on Lighting by Electricity, to which he has referred, was not presented to the House until the 19th of June. I may also say, as he has asked me to state the circumstances under which the Bill was allowed to proceed, that I have given it a good deal of attention. I had several interviews with both the promoters and opponents of the Bill, and I stipulated that any clause, directly or indirectly conferring those powers, should be expunged, and that was done. In Committee, as I am since informed, a clause was inserted at the instance of the General Post Office, which, although it conveyed no new powers, might possibly be misconstrued in connection with a paragraph in the Bill as recognizing some powers as to supplying the Electric Light. The matter, however, was not brought before me by the parties interested in this House. But I have since received a representation from the Corporation of Dublin on the subject; and, the Bill being then in the House of Lords, I at once communicated with my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees in that House (the Earl of Redesdale). I believe that the clause as to the powers has been struck out in the other House, and I am quite satisfied that the Bill as it now stands, contains no power in excess of that already granted to the Company by the Act of 1866.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION
BILL — CORPORAL PUNISHMENT — THE SCHEDULE.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it has escaped his observation that, under the arrangements contained in a Paper issued on the 9th of July, headed "Memorandum explanatory of Schedule relating to Corporal Punishment," flogging cannot henceforth be inflicted for the crime of drunkenness on duty under arms in presence of an enemy, a crime which has been found to be the fruitful source of almost all other military offences; whether it is his intention to retain the use of corporal punishment as a deterrent to the commission of this crime; and, if that is not his intention, whether he will now consider the advisability of abolishing flogging altogether as a punishment for British soldiers in the field?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, the subject had not escaped his notice. The views of the Government upon it had already been expressed by him, and they would be carried out by Amendments which were now standing on the Paper.

PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS—ORDERS OF THE DAY, TUESDAYS AND WEDNESDAYS.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON desired to put to Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question relating to the Motion which the right hon. Gentleman intended to make on Monday next with reference to the Business on Tuesdays and Wednesday during the remainder of the Session. His hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had a Notice on the Paper for Tuesday, the 22nd inst., relating to some unfulfilled portions of the Treaty of Berlin. He did not know whether his hon. Friend had yet placed on the Paper the exact terms he proposed to move; but, at all events, the subject was one of great importance and interest, and he thought the Government would be of opinion that an opportunity should be given for the discussion of his hon. Friend's Motion. Perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman would state, Whether he could give the day which his hon. Friend had already secured?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, admitted that the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was one which the House ought to have an opportunity of discussing, and he would undertake to make such arrangements that the hon. Member would have the same advantages that he would have possessed but for the intention of the Government to make the proposed Motion on Monday next with reference to the conduct of Public Business. He would also make arrangements for the discussion of the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) relating to the water supply of the Metropolis.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE—NOTE-TAKING IN THE MEMBERS' SIDE GALLERY.

RESOLUTION.

MR. SPEAKER: Before I call upon the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to address the House, it will be convenient that I should state, with reference to the Minutes of debates in Committee, taken by my direction, which are about to form the subject of discussion, that great misapprehension apparently prevails in reference to these Minutes. So far as I am concerned, if any hon. Member desires to move for the production of these Minutes, I have no objection, and should advise that, if the House think fit, they be laid upon the Table as an unopposed Return.

MR. PARNELL: Sir, in reference to a matter which occurred yesterday, it devolves on me to submit a Motion to the House, and to ask the House to say that that occurrence is a breach of the Privileges of this House. It will be within the recollection of many hon. Members that yesterday, during the proceedings of a Committee of the House upon the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, the hon. and learned Member for the county of Louth (Mr. Sullivan) called the attention of the Chairman to the presence of a young gentleman, one of the officials of the House, who was seated in the Gallery set apart for Members, and who appeared to be engaged in taking notes of the observations or speeches of certain

hon. Members of this House. The hon. and learned Member for Louth submitted to Mr. Raikes, the Chairman of Committees, that such a practice was not in Order, and, subsequently, upon his Motion that Progress should be reported, in order that your opinion might be obtained upon the question, Progress was reported, and you, Mr. Speaker, took the Chair. Upon a question being addressed to you by the hon. and learned Member for Louth, as to whether the presence of this young gentleman in the Gallery taking notes of the proceedings of the House was in Order, and after some observations had been made, and whilst other observations were being made upon the matter by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan), you, Sir, intimated that it was time you should express your opinion on the question; and I find that, according to the Minutes of the House, which we received this morning, you made this statement—

“As the House is aware, according to the practice of the House, Minutes of our Proceedings are taken from day to day. These Minutes are published under the title of the Votes and Proceedings of the House. As lately it had come to my notice that there had been great and unexpected delay in the progress of the Army Discipline Bill in Committee, on my own responsibility, and for my own information, I desired that Minutes should be taken of the Proceedings on the Bill of a more full character than those which are taken from day to day. And Mr. Speaker concluded by stating that those Minutes have no reference whatever to any particular Member or body of Members of this House, and that they are fair and impartial Reports of the Proceedings of this House.”

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wish, before proceeding with my Motion, to explain that I desire, as much as possible, in what I have to say to avoid any personal reference, or to impute anything either to yourself, Sir, or to any Member of this House, indicating that I suppose anything that has taken place, or that has been directed by yourself, has been directed with any other motive, or any other intention than that of carrying out the duty which you, Sir, consider you ought to carry out, and for which you are responsible to the House. I shall, in what I have to say, avoid, as far as possible, any personal references that are not necessary to my subject, and I shall endeavour not to introduce any irrelevant matter. The Motion which I have to submit to the decision of the House is in the following terms:—

“That any Report or Record of the Proceedings of this House, or of a Committee of the Whole House, made, taken, or kept by officials of this House as an official act or otherwise without the previous Order or sanction or knowledge of the House, and for purposes not revealed to the House, other than the Votes or Minute of the Orders and Proceedings of the House or of the Committee of the Whole House, taken at the Table by the Clerk or the Clerk Assistant, is without precedent in the customs and usages of Parliament, and is a breach of the Privileges of Parliament and a danger to the liberty and independence of debate.”

That is the Motion I propose to submit; and I think I shall be able to show, by reference to one or two precedents, that the House has always been extremely careful in past times to guard against the carrying away of any Minutes, or the making of any notes of its proceedings, other than the Minutes made by the Clerk at the Table of the House when the House is in Session, or by the Clerk Assistant when a Committee of the Whole House is in Session. First of all, I wish briefly to enumerate to the House some of the points which occur to me as being necessary to be understood with regard to the duties of the Speaker of the House. Some considerable misapprehension appears to have grown up lately in the minds of certain leading Members of the House as to the functions and authority of the Speaker. It seems to have been supposed by some hon. Gentlemen that the Speaker of this House has an original authority. Now, that is not so. The Speaker of the House of Commons is chosen by the Members of the House of Commons, and he has not that original authority which the Speaker in “another place,” possesses. Nor has he the original authority which the Speaker in some foreign Assemblies possesses, and the assumption of which original authority this House has always been very careful to guard against. Now, I find at page 239 of Hatsell's Precedents, that we have some very important information as regards the duty of the Speaker. For instance, we find in Section 2, that—

“On the 27th of April, 1604, the House agreed for a rule, ‘That if any doubt arise upon a Bill, the Speaker is to explain, but not to sway the House with argument or dispute.’”

Then, in Section 3, we are informed that—

“On the 23rd of May, 1604, there is a very curious entry in the journal, on the Speaker's having been guilty of an irregularity, in delivering to the King a Bill of which the House had been in possession."

Again, in Section 4—

"On the 21st of June, 1604, the House agreed for a rule, 'That when Mr. Speaker desires to speak, he ought to be heard without interruption, if the House be silent and not in dispute.'"

I merely lay these matters before the House, in order to show what has rather been called in question lately, that the Speaker of the House of Commons has no original authority. Then, again, in Section 5, I find that—

"On the 9th of March, 1620, there is a long debate, in which the conduct of the Speaker was very much blamed; 'That he came out of the Chair without the consent of the House, being required by the greater voice of the House to sit still;' 'That he sometimes neglects his duty to the House, in intruding or deferring the question and hath made many plausible motions abortive;' 'That Mr. Speaker is but a servant to the House, and not a master nor a master's mate; and that he ought to respect the meanest Members, as well as those about the Chair.'"

Then, I find, again, in Section 7, that—

"On the 28th of January, 1677, complaint is made of an irregular adjournment of the House by the Speaker, Sir Edward Seymour; which he justifies himself to have done by the King's command."

Lastly, in Section 8, I find, that—

"On the 19th of December, 1678, a Standing Order is made, 'That Mr. Speaker shall not at any time adjourn the House, without a Question first put, if it be insisted on.'—[Hatsell, ii. (The Speaker.)]

I do not wish to go into all these precedents, because I think that what I have read already will be admitted as clearly establishing my point in regard to the original jurisdiction of the Speaker. I will, however, read the observations which Hatsell makes in reference to the powers and duties of the Speaker. With regard to the jurisdiction of the Speaker, he says, in page 242—

"The Speaker, though he ought, upon all occasions, to be treated with the greatest respect and attention by the individual Members of the House, is in fact, as is said on the 9th of March, 1620, but a servant to the House, and not their master; and it is, therefore, his first duty to obey implicitly the Orders of the House, without attending to any other commands. This duty is extremely well expressed, in a very few words, by Mr. Speaker Lenthall, who, when that ill-advised Monarch, Charles the First, came into the House of Commons, and, having taken the Speaker's Chair, asked him—'Whether any of the five Members that he came to apprehend were in the House? Whether he saw any of them? And where they were?' made this answer—

"May it please your Majesty,

"I have neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak, in this place, but as the House is pleased to direct me; whose servant I am here; and humbly beg your Majesty's pardon, that I cannot give any other answer than this, to what your Majesty is pleased to demand of me."—[Ibid.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that I have sufficiently established my point with reference to the original jurisdiction of the Speaker—namely, that there is a very considerable difference between the power and authority of the Speaker of the House of Commons and the power and authority of the Speaker of almost every other Legislative Assembly. In almost every other Legislative Assembly, the Speaker has original jurisdiction. He has power given to him to do certain things of his own option; but, in our case, the matter is entirely different. He is the interpreter of the Rules and Orders of the House, and in matters of debate, he is the guide and director and the preserver of the Order of our debates; but it is not within his power or function to do anything which has not been previously ordered or sanctioned by the House, or which is not a Rule of the House. And now I come to my next point, and that is, that the taking down of any Minutes, other than the Minutes taken down by the Clerk at the Table or by the Clerk Assistant, when the House is in Committee, is irregular. This is also a matter for which there are very important precedents, which show that this House has always been very careful to guard the taking of Minutes other than those taken by the Clerk at the Table. I find, on referring to the work I have already quoted—Hatsell's Precedents, at page 265, Section 1, that—

"On the 17th of April, 1628, the Lords desire the Journal of the House of Commons to be brought to a conference that they may see the speech of a learned Member, in the 18th year of James the First; to which message the Commons answer—'That there was no resolution of the House, in the case mentioned; and that the entry of the Clerk of particular men's speeches, was without warrant at all times, and in that Parliament, by order of the House, rejected and left.'"

After that, in Section 2, we find that the House—

"On the 25th of April, 1640, ordered that Mr. Rushworth, just admitted Clerk Assistant, do not take any notes here, without the precedent directions and command of the House, but only of the Orders and Reports made in this House."

Then, I find in Section 3, that—

"On the 1st of December, 1640, the Clerk and his Assistants are to be enjoined that they suffer no copies to go forth of any arguments or speech whatsoever."

In Section 4, I find that—

"On the 10th of December, 1641, Sir Arthur Haselrig moved the House against the Clerk, for suffering his Journals or Papers committed to his trust, to be taken by Members of the House from the Table; the House upon this declared, 'That it was a fundamental order of the House, that the Clerk, who is the sworn officer and intrusted with the entries and the custody of the Records of the House, ought not to suffer any Journal or Record to be taken from the Table, or out of his custody; and that if he shall hereafter do it, after this warning, that at his peril he shall do it.'"

Section 6, says that—

"On the 1st of March, 1676, information being given of a mis-entry made in the Journal, in the year 1672, in prejudice of the privilege of this House, and of an omission of an entry in the Journal of this Session, a Committee is appointed to examine and rectify it and report it to the House."

The appointment of the Committee shows the importance which the House attached to the entries contained in the Journals. In Section 9, we find that the House—

"On the 4th of May, 1780, 'Resolved, That the Papers and Accounts presented to this House be carefully preserved by the Clerk, in whose custody they are intrusted; and that no person be permitted to take the same from the House under any pretence whatever; and if any person shall presume to take any Papers or Accounts from the House, that the said Clerk do forthwith acquaint Mr. Speaker, that the House may be informed thereof.'"

That authority further says—

"The duty of the Clerk is summed up in a very few words, in the oath which he takes, before he enters on the execution of his office—'Ye shall make true entries, remembrances, and journals, of the things done and past in the House of Commons.'"

"We see it is, 'without warrant,' that he should make minutes of particular men's speeches; and that he ought to confine himself merely to take notes of the orders and proceedings of the House. These he and the Clerk Assistant both do in their Minute-books at the Table; and from these Minutes, the Votes, which are ordered to be printed, are made up 'under the direction of the Speaker.'"—[Hatfield, ii. (The Clerk—His Duty.)]

Well, now, Mr. Speaker, I have gone through the evidence which I think necessary for the making out of my case, and I think that I have shown—firstly, that the Speaker has no original jurisdiction; and, secondly, that this House has always disapproved of the making of any Minutes other than those Minutes which are made by the Clerk or the Clerk Assistant at the Table. I wish to say, for myself—as it has been said by some people, the authority for which I have no means of estimating, because, of course, I have not taken any steps to watch this young gentleman in the execution of his duty; but it is said that he has made notes of particular Member's speeches in this House only, and that he has noted down the time occupied in the making of such speeches—for my own part, I shall have no objection whatever to any notes that may be made of anything I have ventured to say from time to time in this House; but what I wish is this—that this shall be done in a regular manner. If Mr. Speaker considers that, at any time, it is necessary for him to have fuller Minutes than the Orders and directions and customs of Parliament sanction, his proper course would be to come to the House and say—"I desire for the proper execution of my office that fuller Minutes should be made of the Proceedings of Parliament than those which have been made; that they should specify things which are not specified in the Minutes and Proceedings of the House;" and that having been done, the House would not have been deprived of its jurisdiction and authority in this matter. The House would then be able to direct that these Minutes, as desired by Mr. Speaker should be made, and the House would not be deprived of the opportunity of deciding and judging of a matter with regard to which I have shown, by precedents, the House of Commons has always been exceedingly jealous and tenacious. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House further, and I will conclude by merely moving—

"That any Report or Record of the Proceedings of this House, or of a Committee of the whole House, made, taken, or kept by the officials of this House as an official act or otherwise without the previous order or sanction or knowledge of the House, and for purposes not revealed to the House, other than the Notes or Minutes of the Orders and Proceedings of the House, or of the Committee of the whole House, taken at the Table by the Clerk or the Clerk's Assistant, is without precedent in the customs and usages of Parliament, and is a breach of the Privileges of Parliament."

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out to the hon. Member that the Resolution placed in my hands does not correspond with the words of the Resolution as moved by the hon. Member. [Mr. PARNELL: If I am in Order, I will explain.] The hon. Member concluded with these words—"and is a breach of the Privileges of Parliament." But the Notice placed in my hands goes on to say—"and a danger to the liberty and independence of debate." Does the hon. Member wish to drop those words?

MR. PARNELL: Yes, Sir.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of seconding the Resolution which has just been moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Meath. I intend to follow his example, and to assure you, Sir, that it was not from any disrespect of your authority that the proceeding I ventured to take yesterday, in reference to the matter which is now submitted for the consideration and decision of the House, was taken, nor is there any intentional disrespect in my action to-day in seconding the important Motion which has just been made. When we had an opportunity yesterday of putting to you, Sir, a Question on this important question, you were kind enough to inform us that the reports which were being taken by the gentleman who had been placed in the Gallery were only an extension of the Minutes taken in the usual way by the Clerk at the Table. The ground on which I felt that the proceedings in the Gallery could not be defended upon any reference to the proceedings of the Clerk at the Table was this—that the Minutes taken by the Clerk at the Table are printed, and circulated, read, and examined, and submitted to the Members of this House; that the reports which were being taken in the Gallery of the House had not been submitted to the House; that they were ordered by you, Sir, without any Order from the House, without the knowledge of the House, and without the sanction of the House; and it was upon those grounds, and not at all from any desire to question your motives, Sir, in making the arrangement, that I felt justified in questioning the proceeding and in expressing the opinion that I am here to-day to reiterate, that the proceeding was altogether without precedent in the history of the House of Commons, or in the Records of Parliament. If you had felt it to be necessary, for the more efficient discharge of your difficult duties, that you should have these reports taken, I think it would have been only fair to the House to have asked the consent of the House, and to have given the House an opportunity of saying whether the proposed arrangement was one which was in accordance with practice and precedent, or one likely to effect the great public object which, undoubtedly, you had in view in making the arrangement. Now, my hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) has shown, conclusively, that there is no original authority in the Speaker of the House; that whatever authority he wields and possesses, he wields and possesses as the representative and mouthpiece of this House. I say, then, that that being so, I cannot understand how an act of this kind can be sanctioned, unless it has been ordered by the House itself; and I look upon that as the very strongest point—it is the object of the Resolution moved by my hon. Friend to assert here to-day. Now, reference has been made to the difficulty which the House has felt in passing the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, and you, Sir, were pleased to refer to the protracted discussions upon that Bill as your principal reason for authorizing these unusual Reports to be taken; and there can be no doubt that by referring to the particular discussions which have taken place on a particular Bill, you call up before the mind of the House, and the mind of the country, those who have taken the most prominent part in the subjects discussed. That being so, is it not natural that a number of the Members of this House, who have taken a conspicuous part in the discussion of that Bill, should feel that this arrangement was one that was levelled at them, and, in this way, that their independence as Members of Parliament might become entirely fettered by the arrangement. Now, Sir, unfortunately, a misapprehension which frequently prevails about the conduct of our Business here is reflected in the information that is circulated to the public out-of-doors. I was surprised to find in a respectable morning paper which I read this morning, that our object was asserted to be an attack upon the Speaker of the House when the Speaker of the House was absent. Now, my object, on the contrary, was to prevent a discussion of the conduct of the Speaker in a Committee of the House, and I moved to Report Progress, so that I might bring back the whole venue of the case to the House with the Speaker in the Chair. I, therefore, give the statement contained in that newspaper a most unqualified denial, and I brand it as a deliberate falsehood on the part of the public writer of that journal, who has had the temerity to print such an account. It has been said, on more than one occasion, that if certain Members of this House continue to exercise their privileges in a manner which has been found irksome to Her Majesty's Government, it might be necessary for the House to take certain action with regard to those hon. Members. I do not know how far suggestions of that kind have had any influence on you, Sir; I only know that it was your duty to take notice of any unusual proceeding in this House. I do not find fault with the anxiety which you have exhibited as to these proceedings with regard to the dispatch of Public Business, and I say, once again, that there is no Member of this House who has a more sincere admiration for the manner in which you have usually discharged the duties of your high office than I have. But I trust it is not inconsistent with this opinion to believe that, in a particular instance, you have done what, on a further consideration of all the circumstances of the case, you might yourself be inclined to think unwise and unnecessary. Now, that is all. But the intentions of any hon. Member of this House, and particularly of the highest authority of this House, do not colour the effect of the proceeding. When anything is done which is unprecedented and unusual, and it may be used as a precedent for further action, we have not merely to ask ourselves what was the motive with which the thing was done. I have no doubt the motive was a perfectly honourable motive; but the House is to ask itself—what has been the effect of the thing that has been done? That is the question submitted to the House by the Resolution of my hon. Friend. It is an extraordinary thing that hon. Gentlemen who are proud of the character of the House, and of its dignity, should feel themselves restrained in making reference to any particular occasión. My hon. Friend the Member for Meath said yesterday—and in saying it he expressed the sentiments of most of his countrymen in this House—that in every case where the decision of the House has been recorded, there was no other course open to them than to bow to it. Let it be known here to-day, and let it be known in the country, that we have never, on any occasion, refused to bow to the decision of the House. Let it be known also that we have never refused to accept the ruling of the Chair on a distinct point of Order. Now, these are cases in which we have been greatly misrepresented. I only intend to trouble the House with a few words more, and I have simply this to say—that references as to the pains and penalties which may follow my action as a Member of Parliament will not have any influence on my conduct as a Member of this Assembly. I am here as a Member of a Party that has been sent into this House to carry a great object. I may say that it is nothing less than to win the legislative independence of a nation; and if the Irish Members are in earnest in carrying forward that great mission, there are no pains and penalties which Her Majesty's Government can inflict which they will not be prepared to encounter, rather than allow themselves to be fettered in the discharge of their public duty. But I appeal to English Members to consider the position in which they are placed to-day. They are now, perhaps, for the first time in the memory of the oldest Member of the House, called upon to say whether they will sanction or repudiate what, I think, has been proved to be a gross violation of their Privileges. If it were not for the Irish element which is mixed up in this question, I believe the House would lose no time in recording its repudiation of the action which the highest authority has thought proper to take; but because of the national prejudices which have been allowed to be mixed up in the consideration of this question—for that reason only, English Gentlemen and Scotch Gentlemen—hon. Members of this House from England and Scotland, will have to be on their guard against their own prejudices. They must remember that if they consent to the striking-down of any Privilege an Irish Member possesses as a Member of this House, they are sanctioning the striking-down of Privileges equally their own. It will be very curious if, in the future history of the British Parliament, it shall be said, and said with truth, that that nation which was last admitted within the portals of the Constitution, that country which was the last admitted to a share in the Government, was the first in the great hour of trial to that Constitution to come forward as its only vindicator. It would be still more unworthy of the past history of the House of Commons, if we should ever have to say of it, what Byron said of an ancient classic people, that—

For villain bonds and despot sway.”

I have only to reiterate my determination to go on in the discharge of my duty, respectfully submitting to the decision of the House, strictly acting in accordance with the Rules of the House, firmly planting myself within the safeguards of the Constitution, and defying intimidation, whether it comes from public journals, or from any other source that may be influenced by the coloured reports of our proceedings which these journals transmit throughout the country.

MR. SPEAKER: In order to insure accuracy, I must ask the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to bring up the terms of his Resolution.

Resolution brought up, and read accordingly.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“ That any Report or Record of the Proceedings of this House, or of a Committee of the whole House, made, taken, or kept by officials of this House as an official act or otherwise without the previous order or sanction or knowledge of the House, and for purposes not revealed to the House, other than the Notes or Minutes of the Orders and Proceedings of the House, or of the Committee of the whole House, taken at the Table by the Clerk or the Clerk Assistant, is without precedent in the customs and usages of Parliament.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope, Sir, that the House will not allow itself to be led away by the closing remarks of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) into any discussion foreign to the matter which has been brought before us. We entirely acknowledge that our fellow-Members from Ireland are as much interested in the preservation of the Pri-viliges of this House as any Members who sit on this side of the House, and we entirely acknowledge their right, if they think that those Privileges are in danger, to call attention to the subject, and to make any Motion which they may think necessary for their protection. And I would further say, with regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), that I think there is no question whatsoever as to its being entirely within the right of any Member of this House to call attention to the conduct of Mr. Speaker, if he thinks it right to do so, and that the House is fully entitled to pronounce its judgment on any proceeding on the part of Mr. Speaker on which it may think it right that judgment should be passed. There can be no doubt, whatever, and you, Sir, have more than once expressed such a sentiment to the House, that the Speaker is not the master of the House, but the servant of the House. But I venture to say there is nothing in the conduct you have pursued since you occupied that Chair which has shown that you have been in the slightest degree forgetful of the relations in which you stood to the House. Never, I will venture to say, has any one of your distinguished Predecessors occupied that Chair with a higher character for entire impartiality, dignity, firmness, and courtesy, in the Chair. Now, Sir, having said so much, I hope I may venture to add that, recognizing, as we do, the manner in which you have fulfilled your obligations to the House, it is not too much to express the hope that the House will, in turn, fulfil its corresponding obligations, and that both, as a matter of justice and fairness to Mr. Speaker, and as a matter of convenience in the conduct of our proceedings, and in respect also of the dignity of this Assembly, we should endeavour in all that we do to maintain an attitude of strict and sincere respect for the Officer who presides over our deliberations. That respect must not be respect of the lips only. I do not wish to enter unnecessarily into painful controversy; but I do hope the House will bear in mind that it is not consistent with that respect to come as near as possible to the limit which borders upon a contrary course of conduct. Now, Sir, the hon. Member for Meath, in the form of a Motion, has submitted certain propositions to the House. It is impossible to consider these proposals apart from the circumstances which have given occasion for their being brought before us. Whatever might be our opinion of any abstract Resolution of the nature of that which we are asked to put upon record, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that it is intended as a reflection and a sneer upon the conduct which you, Sir, have pursued, and which you have announced to the House. We cannot but remember that this has grown out of an occurrence which took place yesterday, when Notice was taken of the presence of a gentleman who was taking notes in the Gallery, with regard to whose proceedings you were invited to give some explanation. Upon that question being raised, the explanation which you gave was this—that the gentleman in question was there by your direction, that you had desired that Minutes should be taken of the proceedings on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill of a fuller character than those which are usually taken from day to day. Those Minutes were taken by your direction, and for your information, and I beg to submit to the House that in taking that course, you were, in the opinion of the House, fully justified in the course which you took. I think it is incumbent on the House, if they are satisfied that the course you pursued was one which you were justified in taking—I think it is incumbent on the House, regarding the relations in which we stand to our Speaker, and having regard to the fact that your conduct has been challenged—I think it is incumbent on the House to support you by putting upon record their sense of the propriety of your conduct in this matter. Now, Sir, I apprehend that there is no question whatever as to the right of Mr. Speaker to be cognizant of the proceedings of Committees of this House. There is no doubt, whatever, that when the House is in Committee, it is within the right of Mr. Speaker to take his seat among the other Members, and take part, if necessary, in the debates, and in any division that may take place in Committee. It is not now usual that he should do so; but many of us can remember occasions when Mr. Speaker has taken part in debates in Committee. I understand that it is within the right, and that it is part of the duty, of Mr. Speaker to take notice of the proceedings of Committees, not in his capacity as a private Member, but even in his capacity as Speaker, for I observe here, that, amongst our Rules—Rule No. 211 runs thus—

It is, no doubt, the case that it is necessary the Speaker should have cognizance of what passes in Committee, in order that he may take such measures as he thinks necessary for keeping Order in the House. Well, Sir, then the question also arises, whether, if Mr. Speaker may himself be present, may he, or may he not, require that information, when he is not present, should be taken for his guidance and convenience by any other person? I apprehend that there is no question about that. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Meath said that it is entirely contrary to the Orders of the House that any Notes should be taken in the House, except the Notes taken by the Clerk at the Table and published day by day. That is not so. It is not in accord with precedent that we should lay down such a Rule. For many years it has been the practice of the Clerk to take Notes of the names of hon. Gentlemen speaking, and the length of time they speak, and these Notes have been kept for the information of the authorities of the House, but have not been printed or circulated among the Members of the House. I hold in my hand one of these books, which dates back to the year 1850, and I see the names of every hon. Member who spoke, the hour at which he rose, and the number of minutes he was engaged in speaking, recorded here, and that, I believe, has been a practice which has been continued since that time. It is not covered by the hon. Gentleman's Motion; but it is a practice which, I apprehend, is perfectly consistent with the Privileges of the House. I can see no difference in that practice, and what has recently been done by your orders, except that there is a little more information—a very little more information—in the Minutes that have been taken by your desire, and for your guidance and information. I wish, then, to ask the House if it is not for the convenience of us all that such a record should be kept? We know perfectly well that we cannot have complete information conveyed to us as to full details of debate in the printed Orders. We know that the reports circulated by the Press give a tolerably full account of what takes place in the House; but on such occasions as those to which reference has been made—discussion in Committee—when there are frequent and short speeches, we know quite well that the Press will not report them; and if you wish to have anything like an accurate idea of what takes place in Committee, it must be by some means of an exceptional character that we can obtain the information. I would point out that you, Mr. Speaker, have, on more than one occasion, like your Predecessors, on other occasions, been asked to give evidence before a Select Committee of this House, in order to guide us on questions relating to our Rules and Proceedings, and the advice given to us on these occasions by our Speaker has always been advice of very great value. It is perfectly well known that one of the questions which have occupied of late the attention of a Select Committee has been, whether it would be right, or not, to put any restriction upon the great latitude which at present exists in debates in Committee, and it is not at all an undesirable thing that the Speaker should inform himself in regard to the proceedings in Committees, so that the question being raised, and his advice being sought, he can give that advice with a knowledge of the circumstances. But, Sir, I am only suggesting reasons which may have induced you to take the course you have, in taking steps to obtain information for yourself. What your motives were, are, of course, in your own breast, and I do not see that there is any occasion on the part of the House to ask for them. We are not injured by what has taken place, nor do I see anything that need arouse our susceptibilities. The hon. Member for Meath has founded his complaint on precedents and Rules which he found laid down in old text books in regard to the publication of our debates. But the hon. Member and the House are perfectly aware that many of these Rules were adopted at a time when we held a wholly different theory with regard to the propriety of the publication of our debates. In the days from which he chiefly draws his examples, it was considered by the House of Commons that it was most undesirable and most improper that a stranger should even come in and listen to the debates, or that the Proceedings should be in any way published, because the effect of such publication might, in those times, have caused inconvenience, and might have led to an interference with the freedom and Privileges of Parliament. Therefore, it was that steps were taken not only to exclude strangers—not only to forbid the unauthorized publication of reports, but also to restrain the liberty of the House itself in the matter of taking Notes. But, surely, all that relates to a time which has entirely gone—[Cries of "No, no!"] I hear some murmurs of "No;" but I must say they proceed from a quarter of the House where I should have least expected them. I should have thought that the Gentlemen who are now so sensitive in regard to these Notes being taken, were exactly the Gentlemen who were most anxious to obtain free and fair publication of our proceedings. I should have thought—though I said I would not refer to the closing remarks of the hon. Member for Mayo, that Gentlemen who had so high a task imposed upon them to give battle, as they say, against such odds would desire to appeal to public opinion, and make their sentiments as widely known as possible. Instead of thinking it something threatening and menacing to them, I should have thought the privilege of being reported as having spoken a great many times, and having taken an active part in a debate, would have been matters they were proud of. It is not for me to enter into that mysterious problem as to what are the motives of these hon. Gentlemen in taking these proceedings. I will content myself, attention having now been called to the matter, by taking the step of opposing the Resolution by some Amendment which shall affirm our confidence, Sir, in your conduct. I feel that that is not only due to you, but it is due also to ourselves. We know perfectly well that, at the present time, there are great difficulties in the conduct of the Business of the House. We know perfectly well that there are great difficulties attending any alteration in our Rules or Standing Orders, and we know also that it is within the power of any Member, by following the letter of the Rules, to cause inconvenience to the House, and, perhaps, tend to lower its character in the eyes of the public, although it is probable that he would do so at the expense of his own reputation among his fellow-Members. It seems to me the very first duty we owe to ourselves and the House in which we have the honour to sit—the first duty, on our part, is to support the authority of the Chair, and to assure Mr. Speaker of our readiness to assist and stand by him, when he finds it necessary to take any step with a view to the conduct of Business in a business-like manner. Therefore, I will move, as an Amendment to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Meath—

“That Notice having been taken while the House was in Committee, of the presence in one of the side Galleries of a gentleman engaged in taking notes of the proceedings of the Committee; and Mr. Speaker having informed the House that the gentleman was an officer of the House, and was so employed under his direction, and that the notes taken by him were for the confidential information of the Speaker, this House is of opinion that Mr. Speaker was justified in the directions given by him and is entitled to the support and confidence of this House.”

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I rise, Sir, to second the Motion which has been moved by the right hon. Gentleman. It will not be necessary, fortunately, that I should detain the House long in explaining why I do so. The reasons which have induced the Chancellor of the Exchequer to move the Amendment are so obvious that they can be stated in a very few words. In the first place, I must say that I think the House will now, at all events, admit that it was fortunate we adjourned the consideration of the question until it could be deliberately taken up, and much more convenient than the course that was originally suggested. It is extremely desirable that such a subject should be brought forward as calmly, as deliberately, and with as much absence from excitement as possible. I think the House will be disposed to admit that this was a question entirely within the right of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to bring before the House, and he has done so in a speech of great moderation. I can only trust, if it is necessary that this discussion should be at all protracted, that the further debate may be continued in the same spirit. There are one or two observations to which I wish to make reference. The hon. Member has argued at considerable length a question as to the original jurisdiction of the Speaker. Now, that does not appear to me to be a subject on which it is necessary to dilate; but I must, however, say that the hon. Member in describing the functions of the Speaker has once or twice used an expression which, if not altogether inaccurate, does not, at all events, accurately describe the position of the Speaker of this House. The hon. Member has said that the Speaker is only the servant of the House, and he has brought forward precedents to show that Speakers have described themselves in that manner. Now, Sir, I think in all matters of external authority, the Speaker, undoubtedly, is only the servant of the House; but I do not think that expression adequately describes the position he holds within the House. The Speaker, as we all know, is not only the servant of the House, but he is the highest authority within the House; he represents the House itself, and is the embodiment of the authority which the House must possess over its Members for the preservation of Order. Therefore, the description which has been given, though not altogether inaccurate, is still scarcely adequate. The right hon. Gentleman, who has just spoken, has naturally referred to the precedents given by the hon. Member as to the jealousy of the House in former times with reference to the taking of Minutes of its Proceedings. It must, however, have been obvious to any Member, that these precedents referred entirely to a time when the House entertained a strong and natural jealousy of permitting any reports of its Proceedings. Every precedent which the hon. Member has brought forward refers to the taking and publication of Minutes of the Proceedings of the House. It would have been easy to have found far more numerous precedents referring to the publication of debates, as to which the House, up to a much more recent period, entertained great jealousy. Now, Sir, it seems to me that the reasons of the proceedings on the part of the Speaker, of which the House received information yesterday, are extremely obvious and extremely simple. It is a matter which is known to every Member of the House, that the delay in our Proceedings has been a matter not only of public notoriety, but of discussion in the House, more or less, during the last two or three Sessions. It has also been the subject of inquiry before a Select Committee of this House, and it may again become the subject of inquiry. It is natural, usual, and expedient, when such inquiries take place, that the Speaker of the House and the Chairman of Committees, the highest authorities in the House, should be selected by such Committee to give it information, advice, and guidance. That course was taken. These Gentlemen were examined before the Committee; but I think it will be in the recollection of every Member of that Committee that, on account of the extremely meagre character of the ordinary Minutes of our Proceedings, neither the Speaker, nor the Chairman of Committees, was able to lay before the Committee the full and complete information as to the causes which led to the protracted character of our Proceedings, and the delay which had arisen, which they would have desired to do. Under these circumstances, it was extremely natural that the Speaker should consider it necessary, in case further inquiry was thought desirable, to place himself in possession of the means of giving the House full and impartial information regarding the circumstances. Well, Sir, though I think that the precedents quoted by the hon. Member had very little, if any, application to the present state of things, I am quite willing to admit that it might be difficult to find any record of precedents directly applicable to the proceeding which has been directed by Mr. Speaker. But I think that absence of precedent is not to be wondered at, and ought not, necessarily, to influence our judgment. The fact is, the present state of things—and I am not now going to express any opinion upon it—is altogether without precedent; at all events, to be more correct, without precedent of any ancient date. It is a state of things which is not absolutely new, and which, not to go further back, dates at all events from the time of the last Parliament. It will be within the recollection of hon. Members who sat in the last Parliament, that a considerable number of hon. Gentlemen, some of whom now occupy distinguished positions on the Bench opposite, thought it necessary, in the discharge of their duty, to discuss at very great length the provisions of measures which were brought forward by the Government of that day. That example has been followed to a great extent—I am not going to say it may not have been improved upon—and the effect is, that certain measures of the Government are, at present, discussed at a length so great, that almost the whole time of the House is absorbed in their consideration; and the consequence is, that other measures which have been brought forward cannot be considered at all, or have to be considered very inadequately; and, further than that, some measures of great interest, which independent Members desire to bring forward, scarcely find time for discussion, and the Business of the House in Committee of Supply has to be postponed to a period of the Session when it can only be discussed in a very perfunctory manner. That is a state of things without any ancient precedent, and it is, therefore, only natural that there should be no ancient precedent for any remedy which it may be possible to apply to it. I am not now going to discuss what remedy, if remedy there be, should be applied—at all events, it is safe to say that it is a condition of things which, however patient the House may be—and I think no one will deny that the House has, under the circumstances, shown great patience—the House will not permanently endure, and for which it will be driven some day to find a remedy; and it is of the very first importance that, if any remedy is to be sought for, it should be sought for deliberately and with full information. I think that, under these circumstances, not the censure, but the thanks, of the House are due to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, who has taken upon himself the responsibility of obtaining for himself and, if necessary, the House that information which is necessary. I cannot think for a moment that it is a proceeding invidious to any Member or set of Members in this House. Not one of us doubts—however much we may object to the way in which hon. Members discharge their duty—that what they do is, in their opinion, in discharge of their duty, and I cannot see how it can be supposed to cast the slightest reflection on any Member of the House that full and accurate information should be obtained. I have only, in seconding this Amendment, to add on the part of Members who sit upon this side of the House, my tribute to that offered by the right hon. Gentleman as to the perfect and complete impartiality with which you, Sir, have discharged the duties of your high office. Circumstances have occurred within the last two or three years which have called for the exercise of great judgment, temper, tact, and impartiality; and I must say that I think every hon. Member—whatever view he may take of the conduct of the House towards him on particular occasions—must, upon reflection, bear witness to the perfect impartiality he has received at your hands. I have risen with these few remarks, Sir, to second the Amendment which has been moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "Notice having been taken while the House was in Committee, of the presence in one of the side Galleries of a gentleman engaged in taking notes of the proceedings of the Committee; and Mr. Speaker having informed the House that the gentleman was an officer of the House, and was so employed under his direction, and that the notes taken by him were for the confidential information of the Speaker, this House is of opinion that Mr. Speaker was justified in the directions given by him, and is entitled to the support and confidence of this House,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,)

—instead thereof.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID, who rose amid cries of "Divide, divide!" said: I think, Sir, all will be of opinion that our proceedings to-day will not be improved by hon. Members opposite exhibiting such impatience the moment a Member who, I suppose, they imagine may in some points disagree with them, rises to make a few observations. I think that you will admit, Sir, that ever since I have had a seat in this House I have been willing to bow to your authority, which I have also endeavoured to support, so far as I can, in every way. Therefore, in my opinion, the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not put the issue which is to be considered to-day quite fairly, when he said this was a discussion on the question whether you were strictly impartial or not. I apprehend that nobody either in or out of the House, would venture to dispute the assertion that you are, or refuse to acknowledge the cheerful kindness that you show to every Member in the discharge of his duty; and if we want to establish a question of practice, I, for one, do not in any way desire to question it. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman said that this was a question of free and full publicity; but, in my view, the Notes you desired to have taken were not for the purposes of free or full publicity, but for the purpose of giving you a record of our Proceedings in Committee, of which you have a right to be cognizant, and nobody, so far as I know, has disputed your absolute right to be so cognizant. But, Sir, the point is this—if it is desirable, as it may very well be, that more accurate Notes should be taken of the proceedings in Committee, I should have thought it desirable that the Leader of the House should rise in his place and propose some plan by which that could be done. The result of that would be that we should all have the benefit of those Notes, which, I have no doubt myself, might be of great use to us all. Therefore, if the practice, which you, Sir, in your discretion have thought it right to initiate, is to be continued, I should venture to suggest that these Notes should be regularly published, in order that other Members may have the advantage of the information which they may contain. By this means, we should get over some difficulties and avoid those large issues which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has, in my opinion, unfairly endeavoured to raise. I took down the right hon. Gentleman's words. He said it is convenient for us all that such records should be kept. How can it be convenient for us all that such records should be kept, if we are not to be informed of what those records are? Therefore, I should venture to suggest that there might be considerable advantages if these records, which, you Sir, have directed to be prepared, could be published for the advantage of us all. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has referred to the Notes which have been taken since 1850, and also to Notes which are sent to the Clubs; but I wish to point out that these are not official records, and could not be referred to in any debate in this House. The point, however, which I especially desire to submit to you is this, if, as I have no doubt, you have found these Notes of advantage, would it not be better to give them a more official character, and allow all hon. Members to see them and benefit by them?

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not, Sir, feel quite certain whether I ought to intrude myself upon the House on this occasion, when it is evident that the House thinks—and I confess that I concur in the opinion—that there is no occasion for a lengthened debate; but it is one of those opportunities when, if I must run the risk of incurring an error, I would rather run the risk of incurring an error by speech than of committing an error by silence. I have sat here under the rule of five different Speakers, and this is the first occasion that I can recollect the submission of a Motion to the House impugning in any way the conduct of the Gentleman who fills the Chair. That is sufficient to mark it as a grave occasion, and everyone must feel that it deserves that character. However, Sir, a great change has taken place in the Motion, to which I wish to call the attention of the House. When we were first informed of the nature of the Motion which the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) intended to submit, it was a Motion which made three assertions. The first, and by far the smallest of these assertions, was that the act, of which he had felt it to be his duty to take notice, was an act which was without precedent, and that it was not conformable to the usages of the House; the second assertion was, that it was a breach of the Privileges of the House; and the third assertion, more formidable than either—though the second was formidable enough—was that that breach of the Privileges of the House “constituted a danger to the liberty and independence of debate.” Undoubtedly, Sir, allegations of that kind, entertained, as they undoubtedly were, conscientiously and sincerely, were those which a Member, having that belief, might very well think himself called upon to submit to the notice of the House; for it requires no argument to show how profound is the interest of this House, not only in the integrity and impartiality, but in the sound and strong judgment of their Speaker, and how serious would be any deviation from the line of accuracy, on his part, in dealing with the questions which he has to determine. Therefore, I fully admit the sufficiency of the cause which the hon. Gentleman had before him. But, strange to say, we are now about to vote upon a Motion, from which not indeed the whole, but by far the larger portion, has entirely disappeared. There has been withdrawn the assertion that the Act constituted a danger to the liberty and independence of debate. In the speech of the Seconder of the Motion the expression, indeed, was used, that your proceeding, Sir, had been a violation—a gross violation—of the Privileges of the House; but that assertion, which stood as we had supposed in the Motion, has likewise been withdrawn, and we are now called upon by the hon. Member for Meath to give our votes simply for an allegation that the act which has been done is an act not conformable with the usages and precedents of the House. That, certainly, is a reduction of the indictment upon which I cannot but congratulate the distinguished and eminent person who was the object of that indictment; but it is nevertheless a reduction upon which I cannot congratulate the hon. Member for Meath, who ought to have measured the amount of the necessity before him, and the nature of the challenge he wished to deliver, before proceeding to take so serious a step as that of bringing your judgment into question in a manner which does not admit of compromise. It is not possible to pass by an occasion of this kind. It is the very first dictate of the commonest justice to the Speaker in the Chair, nay, more, it is the first necessity of our own existence as a deliberative Assembly, that we should have no mistake whatever as to the position of our Speaker. Either he possesses our confidence or he does not. I must say that while no one can regard with pleasure an occurrence of this kind, yet it brings with it to my mind, at least, this satisfaction—that I believe in the discharge, Sir, of your weighty duties, you will find your hands not weakened, but strengthened. I will not refer to any of those subjects, more or less extraneous to the debate, which have been touched upon, especially by the Seconder of the Motion; but I wish to give in my entire adhesion to the statement of my noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition, on the subject of the general idea of your office, and likewise to the argument, which appeared to me alike clear and conclusive, of the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the practical considerations which, it is obvious, must have governed your mind, Sir, in the particular course you thought it expedient to take. But this I wish to do, as it has not yet been done—I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that if we are to adopt the reduced and attenuated Motion of the hon. Member for Meath, we shall, Sir, along with you, condemn the practice which it now appears has been in use for 20 years. I do not dispute our title to condemn that practice; but it has never been formally brought before the House, while even many hon. Members of the House have probably been ignorant of its existence. I frankly own I am not disposed to condemn it. I see no reason why the information should not be had; indeed, I believe it to be very convenient information; but strange, indeed, would be our position if we were now to make the condemnation of that practice which has undoubtedly been within the knowledge of many Members of the House from time to time, and which has never attracted a word of disapproval or legislative censure on the part of Gentlemen who now sit at the Table, and who have sat there for 29 years, because of the existence of that habit of noting down particulars which has to-day been informally made known to us. I entirely concur with those who think it is idle to go back to the precedents of the 17th century, unless with the purpose of reading them accurately and applying them with justice. Otherwise, they would be absolutely misleading. The precedents, of which the hon. Member for Meath has quoted a score of instances, are beyond all doubt; but they are precedents which appertained to the integrity of the functions of the House and to the independence of its Members. It was impossible, under the Tudor and Stuart rule, for the Members of this House to have any security, even for their personal liberty, if the sentiments which they individually expressed were liable to be made known to the Sovereign. We cannot, I am afraid, deal with this Motion in any other way than by subjecting it to a distinct negative. For my own part, however, I entirely concur in that which I believe to be the general sentiment of the House with respect, Sir, to your conduct in the Chair. I will even go one step further, and will say I am quite sure that when the Secunder of the Motion himself paid a tribute to that conduct, he intended that tribute to be sincere and emphatic; and although he thought it his duty—I think, very unhappily—to except the present occasion from the scope of his observations, I am convinced that he, too, and, in fact, every Member of this House, with respect to that conduct in the Chair, entertains but one and the same opinion. The opinion of the House being perfectly clear and intelligible on this point will show that we recognize your object, Sir, to be the simple object of placing yourself in a position to advise the House in case of your being called upon for your weighty and authoritative opinion upon any question concerning the Order of the House and concerning the conduct of Business. We believe that you have been governed only by the one sentiment which always prompts you—namely, the desire to discharge your functions in the most efficient manner. Knowing that sentiment, we desire to reciprocate it on our part by every declaration in our power.

MR. COURTNEY thought that every Member of the House must feel deeply conscious of the extreme gravity of the discussion in which the House was now engaged. He wished to explain why he felt constrained to take a different course from that which appeared to have been resolved upon by the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and why it seemed to him to be impossible to adopt the Amendment which had been moved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He hoped it was unnecessary for him to repeat what had been said by every speaker—that he entered into the discussion with the most profound respect for the Speaker, and the deepest admiration of the very impartial and, he might say, the good-natured way in which the right hon. Gentleman had presided over their proceedings. [“Divide!”] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had told them that, although he had sat in the House under five Speakers, he never, until now, knew a Motion brought forward impugning the conduct of the Speaker. [Renewed cries of “Divide!”] He hoped that, while he was venturing to make the few observations he purposed, hon. Gentlemen would give him the benefit of a little silence. It had been shown that Mr. Speaker had taken original action. It had also been shown that that original action was of a nature inconsistent with precedents, and unauthorized as far as precedents were concerned. If it were to be defended at all, it must be defended upon grounds which must be examined, because they were inconsistent with the past history of the House. What was the kind of defence which had been offered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and supported by the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs? The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that the action on the part of Mr. Speaker was of public utility. Now, he was not prepared to deny that; but it should be borne in mind that the Chancellor of the Exchequer also referred to the Notes as being confidential. Consequently, any argument as to the utility of the Notes, on the ground of their public character, failed altogether, when it was also stated that they were confidential. It might well be that such Notes might have been useful for public purposes; but, then, they were taken without authority. It was clear that, from the time of Rushworth, the House had had control over the Notes which were taken; whereas the Notes which had led to the present discussion were taken in a perfectly private way, and were not known to, or sanctioned by, the House. Moreover, if similar Notes had been taken by the Clerk at the Table since 1850, where was the necessity for new action? The defence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer altogether failed on that ground also. The argument of the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs went straight to the question. He urged that the House was dealing with an evil which was unprecedented, and that, therefore, unprecedented remedies must be applied. He (Mr. Courtney) entirely approved of that statement. The weakness of the House had been that, for some time past, they had not recognized the unprecedented conjuncture of circumstances. They were dealing with men who had small respect for traditions, and set at naught mere conventions and understandings; and, in the presence of this fact, it would be necessary to institute new Orders and Regulations. But the evil had been public, and the remedy must be public. To take action privately was not the way to deal with this unprecedented evil. Lawyers stated that hard cases made bad law, and he was afraid that the difficult position in which hon. Members were now placed might lead them into injudicious courses. He spoke not without some feeling on the question, because, two years ago, his own wings were nearly singed. At that time, the conjuncture was difficult and unprecedented. The House, with the connivance of its Leader, and the approbation of one right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) and of one hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) on the front Opposition Bench, took a course which had since been deeply regretted. They were paying, at the present moment, in South Africa, for the folly then committed. Now they had, again, an unprecedented evil, and, instead of approaching it publicly and discussing it publicly, and adopting public means for its suppression, private and unrevealed means were being taken for its suppression. The course they were adopting would not remedy the evil, and the taking of such a course was deeply to be regretted. The means taken did not approve themselves to his conscience. The situation was a most difficult one, and they ought to approach it by other measures, and correct it in another manner.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that if for the last 50 years, a sort of record had been kept of the number of occasions on which hon. Members spoke, and of the amount of time each speaker occupied, he was sure that a perusal of it would at once free him (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) from a charge of frequently intruding himself upon the House. With respect to the subject before them, if it had been publicly proposed by the Leader of the House, or by the Leader of the Opposition, that officials should be appointed to take Notes with the view of the furtherance of Business, and of bringing to bear the judgment of the House under the peculiar circumstances with which they were all familiar, he would have voted for the Motion. He believed it was essential that the Business of the House should be carried on with despatch, and there was a good deal to be said to show that the Business had not been carried on in a manner that was satisfactory either to the House or to the country. At the same time, he did not think it was fair to leave the question on the footing of personal confidence in Mr. Speaker. He regarded that as putting the matter on an entirely false issue. He had, in common with almost every hon. Member on that side of the House, the highest possible respect for the judgment and fairness of Mr. Speaker. The consideration which he freely extended to the humblest Member, and the patience with which he listened to them from time to time, were borne in mind gratefully by many, and by none more than by himself (Sir Joseph M'Kenna); and he would say, for his own part, that up to the time when the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) withdrew a part of his Motion, which appeared to bear a contrary interpretation, he was perfectly prepared to vote against it. But the question now stood in quite a different position. The Motion asserted that an unprecedented practice had lately been originated by Mr. Speaker; but it would now appear from the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the two gentlemen who had been employed taking Notes in the side Gallery were merely continuing a practice which had been previously adopted since 1850. If that were so, there was an end of the question. He did not think the position had been clearly met by that explanation. Mr. Speaker had stated, with much more frankness than anyone else, that he required the information for his own guidance; and he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) could easily imagine that Mr. Speaker felt that the information was necessary. If, therefore, any Member of the House, or Mr. Speaker himself, had initiated the question whether the information should be applied, he would, without going further into it, have voted in favour of its being applied; but, in the circumstances which had actually occurred, he thought it would have been infinitely better if the practice which had been adopted on the present occasion had been initiated under the direct authority of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was surprised at the form which the attack upon Mr. Speaker had assumed. Hon. Members opposite, of the Home Rule faction, two or three years ago, voted, did the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and as he (Mr.

Newdegate) also voted, that the House should have something tantamount to official reports of its debates. The House then refused to accede to that proposal. But that decision ought to justify Mr. Speaker in the opinion of the minority on the occasion to which he referred, in the course Mr. Speaker had taken, upon his own authority, in order to secure for himself fuller information. He was surprised that hon. Members who voted for Mr. Hanbury Tracy's Motion on that occasion should now turn round and impugn Mr. Speaker's conduct. He was surprised that hon. Members who voted for the Motion, that the reports of the debates were insufficient, should now turn round, when they felt themselves in a difficulty, and impugn the conduct of the Chair, for that was the inference that must be drawn from the present Motion. These same hon. Gentlemen had protracted the debates in Committee of the Whole House on various Bills, he (Mr. Newdegate) thought, unjustifiably, and thus had increased the difficulty. It was impossible that Mr. Speaker could attend in his place during such protracted discussions in Committee, and now when he pursued a course which the House had sanctioned since 1850 for the purpose of obtaining the information so necessary for the discharge of his functions, to whom any question that arose in Committee was referred, these hon. Gentlemen impugned Mr. Speaker's conduct. In his view, nothing was so important as to support the authority of the Chair. They all knew the impartiality and kindly temper which Mr. Speaker invariably manifested — unsurpassed by any Speaker in his long experience. He held that the hon. Gentlemen who had, by their own conduct, brought about the state of things which existed, ought to be made sensible of the importance of maintaining the authority of the Chair. He was confident of this—that if the House would preserve its own dignity they must now assert it by maintaining the authority of their Speaker.

MR. O'DONNELL: I think it may be regarded as a remarkable incident in the debate that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) has spoken for several minutes without once going out of Order. On rising on this occasion, I think it is unnecessary for me to add my voice to the general chorus of praise as to the admirable manner in which Mr. Speaker discharges the duties of the Chair. No one feels or recognizes more fully or thoroughly than I do the genuine kindness, the consideration, and the upright impartiality with which the right hon. Gentleman fulfils his important functions. But all that is quite beside the question now before the House. I listened with attention to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and I heard him blaming, or finding fault with, the moderation of the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich has certainly habituated us for some time to the use of vehement denunciation, and it is evident he has not acquired an appreciation of moderation of language. But I think that the course which has been pursued by my hon. Friend the Member for Meath in dealing with this grave and delicate subject will commend itself to the judgment of the House, and that it may be conceded that, if he has committed fault at all, it is well it has been committed on the side of moderation. The speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and of the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs, consisted almost entirely of just praise of the impartiality of Mr. Speaker, and of recognition of the undoubtedly honourable character of his motives. But that has nothing to do with the question before the House. The real question—and I am treating it generally, and not as regards the special case before us—is, as to whether or not Mr. Speaker should, without the previous sanction of the House, employ confidential reporters, in order to inform him upon the proceedings of Members of that House at a time when he is absent. That is the real question before us, and it has not been touched upon at all by either the Proposer or Seconder of the Amendment. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) has alone raised the question in its true character. Now, we do not object to Mr. Speaker's right to be informed of the proceedings of Parliament that take place during his absence from the House. We do not object to an official record being kept; but in the interests of Mr. Speaker himself, of the House, and of hon. Members, we object to hon. Members being spied upon by confidential informers, of no matter how high an authority. It is said that this information is required, because questions of the gravest importance may be brought up. But let me ask the House to consider the two positions. One is that of a Speaker who has become aware of the proceedings of this House through regularly organized channels, under proper safeguards for impartiality, and with proper safeguards for accuracy, and with proper safeguards for veracity. All these questions, Sir, I may point out do not touch you; but they do touch the media of your information. A Speaker who can give evidence on information, the means of collecting which have previously been authorized, sanctioned, and regulated by this House, is a Speaker who gives his evidence and advice in the gravest circumstances with every guarantee that his advice should carry with it all the weight it should carry. But, on the other hand, let us consider the position of a Speaker, who being asked his opinion on the conduct of Business in this House, can give no answer less impotent than this—"I was not in the Committee at the time these proceedings took place; but I have learnt from a couple of menial inferior officials of this House, not sworn, not under any guarantee, not under any safeguard worthy of the dignity of this House, or the gravity of the emergency. I have learnt from these two inferior officials"—their private character may be what you will, but I am dealing with their public weight—"I have learnt from them so-and-so, and can give no other assurance than this most limp hearsay evidence." Is it not absolutely certain that the advice of the most respected Speaker who ever sat in your Chair would not be worth more than the weight of the lightest dust that blows, when founded on no stronger evidence than that of a couple of unauthenticated, unguaranteed inferior officials depending upon you? It is impossible, if the object of Mr. Speaker is to become informed of the proceedings of hon. Members of this House, and if the object of Mr. Speaker is to acquire the means of giving this House advice upon certain circumstances which have happened in its Business. If such is his object then in choosing worthless agents of this kind—I use the word without reflection on the individual—"Order, order!"

SIR LAWRENCE PALK: I rise to Order. I beg to ask you, Sir, whether it is Parliamentary language to speak of the officials of this House as "worthless agents?"

MR. SPEAKER: I am sure the hon. Member will feel that expressions of that kind are unbecoming when applied to officers of this House. They are gentlemen like ourselves, and the hon. Gentleman will, no doubt, withdraw the expression.

MR. O'DONNELL: I thought I clearly explained that I used these words entirely with regard to the legal effect and technical weight, so to speak—"Withdraw!"—I several times pointed out that I would use the word purely in its legal bearings. ["Withdraw, withdraw!"] I will use the word "unguaranteed," then; but I have a perfect right to use the word I did. The strength of any machinery is only the strength of the weakest part; and if a Speaker desires to have full and complete information, should he not choose a means which should be not of the weakest, but of the strongest kind? In all this, neither your impartiality of intention, nor the possible gravity of future emergencies is contested; neither do we object to the taking of official reports, nor to the taking of unofficial reports of the nature contributed to the public Press; but, as I said, in the interests of every individual, in the interests of this House, in the interests of the permanent authority of Mr. Speaker, we object to a means of information of this irregular and unauthentic character receiving the approval of this House. Do we know, does this House know, has this House any opportunity of knowing, what is the system on which these unofficial reports are taken? Is it a method of a full report of the speeches, or a careful précis of the speeches, or is only the substance of the speeches given? Are interruptions mentioned? Are calls of Order mentioned? When a Member on the Ministerial side of the House rises, as Members so frequently rise, to call the speaker to Order, is that carefully taken down? Is it noted that that call to Order gave rise to such-and-such a discussion? Is it noted—which so frequently happens—that the call was rejected by the Chairman? In a word, what guarantee have we that all the circumstances are such as would commend themselves to the general approval of this House? The private respectability of these confidential reporters may be what it may; but without some testimony, without any guarantee of any legal character, how can this evidence, which is no more than legal testimony, weigh with this House, or with the country, if adduced in support of any decision of Mr. Speaker? Unanimously in this House, and most warmly and emphatically on these Benches, without a doubt or hesitation, do we accept your declaration that you have no arrière pensée directed against any individual, and that there is no bias in this note-taking. Sir, we have accepted that statement, and this House has accepted it; but, leaving that case, I will take the case of any other Speaker who has recourse to these means. Does he not infallibly expose himself to comments outside? There is a necessity in these days of publicity that the proceedings of this House should be able to bear the test of publicity out-of-doors. At this moment, while every Member has declared that he accepted your assurance that it was with no intention of prosecuting or intimidating individual Members that these Notes were taken—on this very day, what is called the leading journal of this country, The Times, absolutely states that you have taken these steps for the purpose of bringing an indictment against certain Members of this House. That is, as we know, a false statement, for which you are not responsible; but it is a statement which reckless writers outside your jurisdiction have the power of making, when the agents you employ are not absolutely guaranteed, and have not previously been submitted to the careful approval of the House of Commons. Yes, Sir, it is not only in our interests, but in the interests of Mr. Speaker, that we make this Motion. Sir, if the agents you employ, or which any Speaker uses, have not previously passed through the ordeal of the examination and approval of this House, it is open to a public journal, with a slight sense of its responsibility, as evidently is done by The Times on the present occasion, to contradict your explanation, to refuse to recognize the truth of your assurances, and, in spite of your declaration to the contrary, to say you have set all this machinery in motion for the purpose of bringing an indictment, or of supporting an indictment, against certain hon. Members. It is to defend you, whom we all respect and revere, from the liability to these misrepresentations, that I support the Resolution of the hon. Member for Meath. It has been said that this House is in a difficult position, and we can readily agree, and we can quote reasons which led us to this conclusion, other than those given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington). I think it is calculated to put this House in a difficult position when a Minister of the Crown, and a Member of Her Majesty's Government, can venture, in a public meeting, to speak of hon. Members of this House, not only Irishmen, but Englishmen, and to denounce them to their country as English and Irish revolutionists. This House is, indeed, in a difficult position, when the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with the connivance and the approval, or, at any rate, without that direct rebuke which, I submit, ought to have followed from his Colleagues, dares to speak of Members of this House—presumes to speak of Members of this House—has the insolence to speak of Members of this House—as Irish and English revolutionists. When a Member of Her Majesty's Government rises, and, with little veil and little concealment, asperses the Parliamentary character of hon. Members, they ought to begin their attempt at an indictment by first apologizing for the grossly un-Parliamentary conduct of their noble Colleague. We are not English and we are not Irish revolutionists; we are sincere Constitutionalists, seeking to gain and to maintain the respect of the peoples of these Kingdoms by the zealous performance of our duties, and by the careful consideration of a Bill which seems to be brought in in order to provoke Amendments.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that the Bill is not now before the House.

MR. O'DONNELL: I did not intend, Sir, to convey the impression that I was referring to the Bill. I was only referring to the general conduct of the Government from day to day. "People who live in glass houses should not throw stones." It has already been repeatedly observed in this debate, not on these Benches, but on the front Opposition Benches, that the most objectionable practices attributed to us began with the sanction of Gentlemen now in power, and that the Leaders in these practices which are now called objectionable have been loaded with office and emolument. At the same time, Sir, in justice even to those who grant us such little justice, I would beg to observe that these practices, deemed so objectionable, date further back than the last Parliament. It will be within the knowledge of even superficial students of Constitutional history that Lord John Russell declared, in regard to his Reform Bill of 1860, that that Bill was choked and deprived of every chance of being carried through the House by the accumulation of Amendments piled upon it. In the debates relating to the first Reform Bill, a staunch Constitutionalist, Sir Charles Wetherall, after delaying the House by repeated Amendments, after sitting beyond midnight, and through the small hours of the morning, until those small hours began to get great ones—on the House rising, and it being discovered that rain was falling outside, audibly regretted that "he had not known it was raining, or he would have treated the House to a few more divisions." I would venture even to submit a small piece of advice to those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who have so copiously advised us. The best way to prevent a difficulty in the despatch of Public Business is to occupy the House with Public Business worthy of the name. I can say, with absolute certainty, that no opposition will be offered to the discussion of substantial measures of real importance, really conducive to the public good. I utter these observations in support of the hon. Member for Meath; and I trust, in any further discussion, the question of your impartiality, Sir, and of your fairness, which was never doubted, will not be again brought in question, and trailed between the House and the real object in dispute. It seems to me improper of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to turn the House from the real question by panegyrics upon you, Sir, which you do not really require, and by disclaimers and repudiations of charges upon your motives which were never made. The question is the sort of report which you have chosen to take, and whether it might not be amended? This House is willing to place at your disposal every means which may be required for your full and complete information with regard to the proceedings of this House; and speaking for myself, and, I am sure, speaking for many of my Colleagues, it is not I or we who would regret a full and complete account of the proceedings of this House. Sir, if the number of times that hon. Members have risen to Order, and only in disorder—if the number of Notices which led to debates, and which the Chairman has declared to be without just cause—if these are reported, it is a pity that the report could not be completed by something like a representation of the numerous, but inarticulate, interruptions which often interfere with the free discussion of Public Business in this House.

DR. KENEALY: This, Sir, is a very great and grave question, and I regret very much that we have not had the opinions of a larger number of Constitutional lawyers than we have had; because if there be anything upon which this House, from its first foundation, has prided itself, it is upon securing the independence of Members in their Parliamentary position. It is the opinion of a great many here, whether rightly or wrongly founded I will not inquire, that the policy recently adopted, not only by hon. Members on the other side of the House, but also by the threats freely indulged in by newspapers which we know are in the pay and employment of the various Parties, are calculated in the highest degree to fetter the independence of Members. In the very article referred to by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), I find the leading journal describing Irish Members, who have rendered such valuable assistance in this House by their Amendments to the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill—who have cut out of it, in a great measure, one of the most objectionable features by which it is disfigured—designated by the insulting name of "filibusters." Now, Sir, that is intimidation; and I only wonder—indeed, I regret—that the Irish Members have not thought it fit to bring the editor of The Times to the Bar of the House, for using language so highly derogatory and insulting. Irish Members, Sir, and a great many English Members, think that this practice, recently adopted under your auspices and sanction, of having clandestine and nocturnal reports made of speeches delivered here by hon. Gentlemen, is calculated, I have no doubt, without your sanction, your design, or intention, to operate upon them as a species of terrorism in the discharge of their duty. Therefore, I think every Constitutional lawyer in the House, at all events, ought to express in some way his opinion as to the way in which this new mode of Parliamentary procedure should be met. I have listened with great attention to the arguments on both sides. I observed that whenever the Tories wish to establish or to introduce any new system of despotism, they can always rely upon the aid of the Whigs. Indeed, this is one of the greatest incentives to the Tories violating the Constitution, which they are not usually disposed to do, having much more regard in their political proceedings for the Constitution than the Whigs. I notice that they never evade the Constitution that they do not reckon upon Whig support. Accordingly, when they come forward to-day to support this step, which I humbly regard as an unconstitutional proceeding, they have every Whig precedent in its favour. No one was aware that under the Administration of Lord John Russell, in 1850, these secret documents which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-day produces were first invented. I was extremely anxious, when the right hon. Gentleman produced that extremely suspicious pamphlet, that he should favour us with a specimen of its contents. I do not know what it contains. We are all left in blissful ignorance of that; but I am very glad that the debate has occurred, if for no other purpose than that it will let the public know that in the Whig Administration of 1850 there was first devised a system of espionage on the Members of this House. That system is perfectly dishonourable, in my judgment, and disgraceful to the Administration of that day, because nobody knows what particular light he figures in in that volume. The right hon. Gentleman has not favoured us with a specimen of the last thing the Whigs have invented. We are asked to-day to support what I cannot characterize in sufficiently strong language, but what I must protest against as a system calculated to interfere with hon. Members in the due discharge of their duties. We do not know the words written down. We cannot tell what comments may be made. We do not know what the reports are. We have no information, and we can have no knowledge of the spirit of the reporter. We cannot tell whether he takes down word for word, or whether he gives what he believes to be the substance of the speech. This reporting is calculated to excite a species of terrorism in the minds of hon. Members, for they know not what may be produced afterwards against them, if you, Sir, should be called again before a Committee to decide what should be the punishment for obstruction. When the Divorce Bill was first introduced, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) is reported to have said that he had the very strongest objection to its provisions, and that he was prepared to take a Division upon every clause, every section, nay, upon every line and word of the Bill. If that is not obstruction calculated to bring this House into contempt, I do not know what is. Irish Members have not gone so far as that, nor within 100 miles near it, and yet they are universally denounced by speakers and newspaper writers as though they were the greatest nuisances and the worst obstructionists ever known. In justice to those Members representing Irish constituencies, they ought to protest against this language being used to them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has not advanced any argument against those introduced by the Proposer and Seconder. There is no doubt whatever that all precedent is against the employment of private reporters by anybody. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich thought he had established a very great point, when he said that the circumstances differed very essentially from the circumstances of the time when the various precedents were laid down which were quoted by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). He said, in the days of the Tudors and the Stuarts, that it was necessary to prevent Members of the House from being intimidated, and that, therefore, the House was exceedingly jealous of its Privileges. I quite believe that; but there is another kind of tyranny, which may be just as powerfully exercised over Members of the House, in their Parliamentary character, as that of the Tudors and the Stuarts—and that is, the tyranny of an overwhelming majority, who may be led by their Leaders to do an act of quite as much injustice. When the word “terrorism” was used, it was very well used, for we have observed nothing but a threat of unknown punishments, which are held, like the sword of Damocles, over the heads of the Irish Members, for endeavouring to amend as bad a Bill as was ever presented to the House of Commons. I shall support the Motion, Sir, not from any want of respect for you, but because I think this is a dangerous course for us to enter upon, and because we are told by those who are best calculated to give an opinion that it is likely to operate as terrorism. When, therefore, the hon. Member for Meath goes to a Division, I shall be found in the same Lobby.

MR. SULLIVAN: I am sorry that Her Majesty's Government have evaded the issue raised by the Resolution before the House. That proposes to condemn an act, the Amendment to praise a man. That is not the way in which so grave a Parliamentary issue ought to be met, if it is met at all, by Her Majesty's Government. The act proposed to be condemned is one which is to be dealt with according to the customs and usages of Parliament. If, upon that view, it can be defended, let it be defended; and if it is to be tried and condemned on such an issue, let it be condemned. What has this Motion to do with praising an individual? I feel, and I think many others do the same, that they are free to accept the Amendment, and yet to vote for the Resolution; and I say, candidly, that I should have voted for the Resolution in an infinitely stronger form than that in which it is before the House of Commons. It is a common and shallow line of argument to represent an opponent as making a personal attack, and then, if that charge is resented, to say he is hauling down his flag. To-day we have the snare set before our face; but surely this is undignified when our liberties are on their trial, to descend to mere flattery of the Speaker, who is listening to them in the Chair. I shall deal with all this in a sentence and pass it by, because I scorn to call it argument. There is none in this Resolution. I think I can speak for my Friends present, when I say that we impugn not your sense of justice, integrity, and impartiality, but an error of judgment by committing an act which is without precedent in the annals of this House, and is dangerous to the liberties of debate. Let us see exactly how Her Majesty's Government deal with it, and how the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs, at their command, regards it. If they have searched the records for precedents, they have nothing to substantiate the position taken up by Her Majesty's Government, who were brought into Office very largely by the persistent policy of obstruction which certain of their Members pursued towards the late Government. Having rewarded those professional obstructors of Government measures with office and a seat on the Treasury Bench, they now come down and wince under the treatment which they themselves employed towards the Army Purchase Bill and the Irish Church Act. I concede to the right hon. Gentleman who, for what he has done, has been made Chief Secretary for Ireland, the right to do that which he has done. Indeed, I have never challenged it; but when he comes into Office a cry is raised by hon. Members because we offer resistance to the mischievous and obnoxious propositions of the Treasury Bench. I say that we are in our right in doing that which we believe to be vital to the interests of the country, and availing ourselves of those means which the wisdom of our ancestors provided for a minority fighting in defence of public liberty. This line of conduct which we follow has been recognized for years, and it must now be taken into consideration in connection with the threats of imprisonment or expulsion from this House, which we are told are now being considered, in order to silence the legitimate opposition of Members of this House. The fact that certain Members have spoken so many times is to be made a ground for an indictment. How is it to be substantiated? The public records ought to supply it. We pay thousands a-year to Mr. Hansard for a faithful record of our proceedings, and, surely, upon that record Her Majesty's Government might elect to proceed, or threaten to proceed, towards imprisonment or expulsion from this Assembly. But what is the course adopted to obtain evidence? If the mind is not free, the Member is not free, and his language is not independent. In such a state of things the Government have made five ineffectual attempts to grasp a Member of this House, with a view to punishing him. They have made a spring upon the indicated prey; but it has eluded their grasp, for the Treasury Bench was wrong, and he was right. Again and again the Minister has made a spring upon him, to punish and expel him, and once more he has found the President against him, and that it was a Minister who was in disorder, and that the victim was actually within Order. In this state of things, we find an official in that part of the House set apart for Members of the House as an official act, for that is the difference between him and the Clerk at the Table, making a secret and a surreptitious record of the proceedings of this House. Is it honest to threaten Members in this way? We cannot tell what the record is. There seems to be a sort of tally or score of the rising and sitting down of hon. Members. It is not a faithful short-hand report. What it is nobody can say, for it is taken without the previous knowledge and assent of this House. If you thought it right for the House of Commons to have a more perfect record than the Clerk at the Table takes, it would have been within your province to announce to the House what you thought desirable. Instead of that, we find this gentleman there taking these Notes. I say, if this had happened in the time of Pym or Hampden, someone would have been sent to the Tower to-day. I say that a man would have put himself in serious peril if, in the reign of either Charles or James, any Member of this House had stationed an official in the Gallery to spy on the proceedings and to get a secret and surreptitious record of them. Where is this record? We declare that it is without precedent. Now, Mr. Speaker, I warn the House of Commons that there is never a time when it is more necessary to be deliberate and calm than when you are about to step forward to inflict punishment upon any Member of the House. That is just the time when this House ought to be free from excitement, or anger, or irritation. Above all, if you are intending to menace with expulsion or penal consequences any Member of this House, you will deprive the act of all moral weight in the country, and of all real substantial force in the House, unless you take your proceedings towards him fairly, openly, and with notice to him of what you are going to do. You have no right to go secretly behind his back and make up a record against him. I warn you, Gentlemen—[“Order, order!”]—I warn this House, Mr. Speaker, and I rejoice to find hon. Members are so careful of the rules of debate—I warn the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, to remember that this Institution is destined to last for hundreds of years, as it has come down to us for centuries before, and let us not purchase, by a sacrifice of any of the liberties of this House, the momentary gratification of a triumph over a minority so small. You may strike down a few Members who are troublesome to the Government, not to the House; you may strike them down, you may fetter them, you may silence them; but please recollect, Mr. Speaker, that as long as they entrench themselves behind the precedents, usages, and customs of this House, they are in a position which you cannot assail without disaster to the country at large. Therefore, I say to-night, if this be, as we declare it to be, an act which cannot be fortified by reference to precedent; if it is an act which would have been resented in the days when the liberties of this House were fought for at peril to life and limb; it behoves us, for the sake of the future which comes after us, that this shall be no precedent, and shall meet with the prompt repudiation of the House of Commons. I hope the House will understand me. I desire to impeach, in the strongest language consonant with the highest personal respect for you, Sir, the correctness, in a Parliamentary sense, of the course of procedure which you have adopted. I desire to be understood as offering against that act my solemn and most vehement protest, believing, as I do, that it must be fatal in the end in establishing a precedent.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: Mr. Speaker, I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has placed some Members of the House in a considerable difficulty by the course he has taken. I agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) in thinking that he has not fairly met the practical question before the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to get out of his difficulty by moving a Vote of Confidence in yourself. I have only to say, Sir, that I should join with the utmost sincerity in voting that confidence in you. Upon the other hand, we have before us a definite Resolution, a definite declaration; not referring to your general conduct, but to one precise act of which it is intended to complain. The Resolution proposed by my hon. Friend is, in plain words—that an act has been done without precedent, and that it is, therefore, open to objection. I, for one, feel morally coerced to give my vote in favour of that Resolution. At the same time, if the House will allow me to say so, I should be perfectly willing, and I should rejoice, to join with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in declaring my fullest confidence in the impartiality, the justice, and the honour of Mr. Speaker. The Chancellor of the Exchequer began his speech in a manner which seemed very like trifling with a great question. He began by a panegyric on Mr. Speaker, which we all must endorse. He then went on to say that Mr. Speaker had always been so just, and impartial, and kind to us, that, therefore, it was our business to support him on all conceivable occasions. It is not in that way, by an interchange of courtesy and kindness, that I feel bound to support the Speaker of the House of Commons. It is, of course, our duty to support him. It is a necessary condition of the Business of this House and of the discharge of all Public Business, that we should lend him our habitual and steady support. This, however, is merely a question of whether, in one single instance, a certain act done was or was not according to precedent, and is or is not open to objection? The Chancellor of the Exchequer, apparently, had not quite made up his mind as to the character of the act. I remember that Lord Palmerston, describing in one of his letters a certain debate in this House, in which several distinguished Gentlemen took part, gives great praise to some of them, but singles out one or two, and quietly observes that those hon. Gentlemen, having no clear idea in their minds, conveyed no clear idea to the House. It seems to me that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on this occasion, had no clear idea of the purpose of the act of which we are complaining, and, therefore, has failed to convey any idea to the House. He spoke of it, over and over again, as if it were some new and happy device for having better records of the debates of this House. He said of some of my hon. Friends near me—"These are the gentlemen who asked for fuller reports, and yet they object to the publicity which would surely bring on them all the praise they desired." Why, Mr. Speaker, to have heard that argument, one would have supposed you had discovered some new and valuable method of publishing our debates, of trumpeting them to the end of the world—of placarding any great speech made in this House at Charing Cross. I will ask any hon. Member whether that is the nature of the proceedings taken, or whether this is merely a new way of keeping a clearer and more precise record of all the speeches delivered here? I would appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and ask, whether the ringing cheers with which they greeted some part of the debate last night, the amount of emotion and even of passion which they displayed, were really called up by the discovery that some new plan had been invented for keeping a record of our debates? I need not appeal to them. I can appeal to a higher authority—yourself, Sir. You yourself, Sir, the other day, made a statement of the purposes of this new arrangement, very different from that in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer tried to make us believe he really believed. In your explanation, you distinctly stated that this new device had reference to certain difficulties raised to the passing of a particular measure in the House of Commons. Yet, to have heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer, one would suppose that Mr. Speaker had nothing better to do in his leisure than to fill his mind with records, carefully prepared, of all the speeches made on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, and to read them for his own personal edification. You, Mr. Speaker, have distinctly explained that, and have put aside any attempt to put an erroneous delusive colour on the action itself. This is, then, distinctly some new practice to be adopted with reference to an alleged new procedure in the House of Commons. The thing itself is new; it is without example or precedent, and it has direct reference to some measure to be introduced for the purpose of making a change in the Business arrangements of the House of Commons. Is it wonderful that hon. Members take alarm at the way in which it was introduced? It may be that the House may be pleased to alter the arrangement of its Business. We have heard a great deal of talk about obstruction. We hear so much talk, indeed, of it, that the very denunciation of obstruction becomes an instrument and an agent of obstruction. Almost as much time is taken up in denouncing it as is spent in promoting it—if anybody is really purposely carrying it on. I am not going to discuss that question. I am content to know that I have never taken any part in it, and really do not believe that there is any Member in this House who is influenced by a mere desire to obstruct its Business, or who would wish to postpone any particular Motion without a definite and legitimate purpose. Let it be observed, also, that this obstruction is not quite so new an act as hon. Members suppose. I do not think I can quite agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) in awarding the merit of that invention to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Long before he had the chance of gladdening the debates of this House obstruction was a constantly employed and constantly denounced weapon of warfare. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) spoke of the Reform Bill introduced by Lord John Russell in 1860. That was, indeed, admittedly crowded out by the mass of Amendments poured in, not from the Opposition for the most part, but from the luke-warm Liberals behind the Ministerial Benches. But there was then another form of obstruction, which, I am happy to say, we have not seen in recent times—corporal or physical obstruction. I remember perfectly well, on one occasion, that an attempt was organized to count the House in the middle of that debate, and that a great number of energetic Conservative Gentlemen went outside, and endeavoured, by sheer force and personal strength, to keep Liberal Members from getting back to their places. An hon. Gentleman, whom I do not now see in his place, a well-known Member of the Conservative Party who sits below the Gangway, had then the distinction of being complained of to your Predecessor, by an hon. Gentleman now a Judge in this land, who declared that he interposed his considerable bulk between him and the door, and so prevented him from coming in. That is only one species of the obstruction which has always been a more or less recognized, and much complained of, weapon in Parliamentary warfare. Those who wish to push a Bill through naturally complain of those who obstruct it; and those who object to a measure are only too happy to use some obstruction themselves, or encourage others to adopt it. I remember that in this House, some years ago, an hon. Gentleman, who is now the Governor of a Colony, used to divide the House again and again, with a small band of four or five Members, until, indeed, the sun shone in on these windows, in order to defeat a measure to which he was opposed, and he was an honoured Member of the Conservative Party. It may be that a proposal will be made for restricting in some way the liberty of debate and the rights of minorities; but I trust that no such attempt ever will be made, and that if made that there will be sufficient public spirit in the House to resist any such change in our legislation. If it ever is to be attempted, if that most serious change—more serious than any yet introduced in our time—should ever be sought for, it ought to be done fairly, openly, and deliberately, and every proceeding or act, however small, that leads up to it should be done with the full knowledge of the House, and in the full light of open day, that not only the House but the public at large may know the importance of it. Let me venture on one illustration of the danger of overbearing a small minority, taken from the history of another country, and on the statement of a great man who died some two years ago—M. Thiers. He has left on record that if the French Chamber could but have had 48 hours' more debate, 48 hours' more of speech-making and discussion, the unhappy war with Prussia would never have been commenced. He declared, as a mere statement of fact, that the explanations extorted from the Government would have so opened the eyes of the people, and so changed the condition of affairs, that no Ministers would have dared to venture upon a war in the face of such admissions; but the small minority were crushed by the Parliamentary system existing in that country, and at a certain time the triumphant majority overbore them. Well, for a time, they had their triumph; but that triumph brought France to temporary ruin. I do not think any such terrible emergency will arise in our time, or in any time, in this country; but in making our arrangements as to the Business of this House, we must not make them merely and solely in preparation for the life we are accustomed to, but they must be adapted to stand the strain of a great difficulty to bear the burden of some sudden national crisis. At all events, it is certain that such a change will call for serious and solemn debate, and that nothing can be more dangerous than to have any proceedings leading up to it suddenly sprung upon the House as a mere surprise. Therefore, I cannot help thinking that the House has some reason to complain of this act, however insignificant or unimportant in itself, which has been lately done. I do not wonder that certain Members in especial have taken it up with a greater sense of alarm than the House in general. Some hon. Gentlemen do not trouble themselves much about the future, and are not even deeply concerned in the actual measures now going on. I think it is rather unfortunate that that phrase—the Business of the House—should be so often used as to lead Members away from a true sense of their public duty. The Business of the House is not to push legislation through at express speed, but to have Bills carefully and steadily prepared and made perfect; and if, in the course of that work, there is more delay than the patience of hon. Members can sometimes bear, I would ask them, fairly, is it not better to put up with that than to imperil the rights of however small a minority in the House? The great pride and characteristic of the English Parliament has been that no overbearing majority can silence the minority, and this I trust will always be its chief distinction and its glory. But if there is a change to be made, it must be made solemnly and seriously, and must not be in the nature of a surprise. I believe that this act is without precedent, and is part of the intention of some of Her Majesty's Ministers to go on to further legislation trenching on the liberties of the minority and on the rights of free speech. I, therefore, feel morally compelled to support the Resolution; although I should, at the same time, feel the greatest readiness in expressing the fullest and most complete confidence in the justice and fairness of Mr. Speaker.

MR. HOPWOOD: Sir, I always show the greatest respect for all I have ever heard you say; but feelings of even affectionate regard for you should not guide us in this matter. I do wish there was an intermediate course by which we could bear our unfeigned testimony to your conduct in that Chair and in every relation of life, and yet say that we think that the course you have recently adopted should not be continued. ["Divide, divide!"] I must say that I hope the convictions of hon. Gentlemen will not lead them to interfere with the convictions of other hon. Gentlemen. This is so painful a ground that we now take that we are not likely to have done it lightly, and we do not desire to be longer about it than is absolutely necessary. The affirmation we make is that this course is without precedent, and that if it is without precedent it is dangerous to the Privileges of the House. I think nobody can contend that it is not new in principle, and if it be out of our power to ascertain or control it before it is done, it is dangerous and subversive of our Privileges. I go that length, although my hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) may have withdrawn those words. I regret extremely that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) should have turned that taunt upon us with all the power of language with which he always appeals to his hearers. For the first time in my political life the sound of his voice brought no pleasure to me, because I thought he was perpetrating an unfairness which was below the level of his very high position and talents. Not one of the hon. Gentlemen who have advocated the Amendment seemed to me to state anything worthy of notice as an argument. On the right and on the left the advocacy is based upon what I must say is not quite candid—a pretence, forsooth, that this was means resorted to to secure a fuller count of our debates and proceedings.

You, Sir, never put it on that ground. Everyone knows you are incapable of anything like equivocation, and you have put it upon this ground—that you want these facts for your own information and for the service of the House, a motive we all recognize; but is it so defined in the plea now put forward? They admit it is without precedent, and then, forsooth, when we refer to the precedents and the language held in former days, they tell us, in nearly so many words, that these are musty precedents, and are not at all to guide and direct our relations. Musty precedents, indeed, is the language. Is the language of your noble Predecessor who said—"I have no eyes to see, and no ears to hear, anything the House does not allow me to see and to hear"—do they mean to say that that is a musty precedent? If it is one at all, it proves our case. We maintain that the Speaker has no power of originating anything. Is that an origination? Who can doubt it? Can the same power place a detective in that Gallery to watch the movements of particular Members of Parliament? In what does that differ? You appoint a Clerk. What is he to watch? You are informed; and when we inquire who has done this thing, then we are told it is by the order and direction of the Speaker. Then the right hon. Gentleman opposite actually defends it on such a ground as this—that Mr. Speaker is, forsooth, a Member of every Committee, and may be present if he likes and take a note of everything that goes on. Who denies that? Why condescend to such an ordinary truism, such a Parliamentary truism? How does it advance the discussion? All this proves to me that the right hon. Gentlemen on both sides feel that there is a difficulty in straightforwardly defending what has been done. I wish, Sir, you had risen in your place and said—"I find what I have ordered has given occasion for some remark, and I have consequently directed its discontinuance." I believe that would have satisfied the whole of the House, and that many who will vote for the Amendment would have been glad to have been saved the necessity. I should have been glad to be spared the necessity of making any remark. Every Member must speak for himself; but I think that as no one has said, no one can say, that it is a wise act on the part of the Chief of the House to place somebody to take a note of what its Members do, and that for an avowed purpose, and in connection with a notorious assumption that some hon. Members of the House are supposed to have practised obstruction in the discussion of a most faulty Bill. Does it not imperil Mr. Speaker's position as the man we are all under, who is set above us to decide in calm impartiality between us, of every Party or section of a Party, and on whom the obscurest Home Ruler or the humblest individual ought to be able to rely for fairness? Oh! Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me that this proceeding is a dangerous one for which I am sorry, for which I think by this time you are sorry, and I am sure the inmost conscience and heart of the House cannot and will not support it.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: I have abstained from taking any part in these painful proceedings, because I cannot concur with the views of hon. Members opposite with whom I act sometimes. [An hon. MEMBER: Sometimes!] I act with them when I think they are right; and I abstain from acting with them when I think they are wrong. I think on the present occasion they have made a false step, which will be injurious to the influence of the Irish Members in this House. I maintain that the whole of our Parliamentary procedure depends upon the respect paid to Mr. Speaker, and if that is in any way diminished or impaired, it may be fatal to Parliamentary government in this country. Anybody who has read history, or attended to precedent, will see there are a very few cases in which a Resolution has been moved, aimed at Mr. Speaker, and it has only been done under the gravest circumstances. Mr. Speaker is much more than the servant of this House. He is the President of this illustrious Senate. Sir Erskine May, whom everyone acknowledges as an authority, very well sums up this matter when he says—"He is the representative of the House itself, its powers, its proceedings, and its dignities." What is the occasion on which this Resolution has been moved? What has occurred? Hon. Members opposite had some grounds to be suspicious. They found there was a person taking Notes, of whose authority to do so they knew nothing. They had a right to make inquiries, and I do not find fault with them for bringing the matter before the House. But when, Sir, you told the House that this was done by your direction and for your own use, so that you might be better able to perform your duties, the matter ought to have terminated at once. Instead of that, it was carried on; an attempt was made to move a Vote of Censure in a hasty manner, and then a Resolution is brought forward, bringing the gravest charges against Mr. Speaker—charges so grave and so unfounded that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was obliged to give up part of them. He maintains that what he complains of is unprecedented. Now, no one has a greater respect than I have for precedents; but it is one thing to be without precedents, and quite another thing to be acting against precedents. You may require a new precedent, and because a certain thing has not occurred before that is no reason why it should not occur. If this is unprecedented, it is not, therefore, contrary to precedent. But, from the speeches of hon. Members, it might be supposed that the Star Chamber was to be revived and Notes were to be taken down secretly and brought before the House. But what are the real facts of the case? In the Press Gallery we have Reporters who give full reports of what is going on to everybody who chooses to read them. Then an officer took down the hour at which Members rose and sat down. Was not that already sent from the Cloak Room to all the Clubs in London? I shall vote for the Amendment, because a charge is never brought against Mr. Speaker except for a great breach of Privilege, and because we ought to show on the Books of the House that we had the fullest confidence in the impartiality of Mr. Speaker.

MR. E. JENKINS: As I propose to support the Amendment, perhaps the House will forgive me, if I state the reasons which have led me to that conclusion. I am, naturally, very sorry to differ with many of those with whom I am very often in association; but I cannot help feeling in regard to the speech of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) that the plea he has put forward, powerful as it is, and calculated to influence—and I know that it has influenced the judgment of many hon. Members on this side—that it really does set aside that which is at the bottom of all these proceedings. He took exception to the fact that the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) had asked the House to take into consideration the circumstances in which the Business of the House was placed. My hon. Friend was, I think, hardly fair in stating that the noble Lord used that as an argument. It is not true that the noble Lord had pointed to that as an argument; but he did allude to it, as a matter which this House was bound to take into consideration in forming a judgment upon the action taken by Mr. Speaker. I feel that it is the duty of everyone, and especially of those who were most Liberal, most Radical, and most in love with Parliamentary government, to take this opportunity of protesting in the most solemn form against the disgrace which is being brought upon Parliamentary government by the proceedings to which the noble Lord has alluded.

MR. CALLAN: I rise to Order. The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) refers to disgrace being brought on this House by hon. Members. ["Order, order!"] He stated that disgrace was being brought upon this House by the proceedings of certain Members. I have to ask you, Sir, is it in Order for any Member to make such an assertion?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) is in possession of the House, and I see no reason to interpose. It will be open to the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) to make any observation he may think proper in commenting upon his remarks.

MR. E. JENKINS: No doubt, one will be subject to these interruptions; but they will not deter me from saying what I feel it to be my duty to say. It is a matter which this House is bound to take into consideration in forming its judgment in relation to the action of Mr. Speaker. It must consider the state to which this House is brought partly by the action of certain Members—[Mr. PARNELL: Including the hon. Member for Dundee.]—and partly by the weakness of its Ministers. Surely, of all the hon. Members who ought not to interrupt me in the observations I am making, it is the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). If the slightest sound is ever emitted from the opposite Benches when he is speaking, he immediately addresses those Benches in a tone of deprecation of such interference with the liberty of Parliament. Yet, when I happen to disagree with him upon one point, I find myself immediately interrupted. But, to come back to the point before the House, I wish to ask the House to consider really, after all, if this is a question to be governed entirely by precedent? I am bound to say—and I am sure, Sir, it will not be misunderstood by you or any Member of this House—that when this matter was first brought to the attention of the House, and when I heard that a certain gentleman was sitting in the Gallery of the House taking these Notes, that the first impression upon my mind was a disagreeable one, and that I felt anything but sure that there might not be some ground for the objection taken to it. No sooner, however, was your explanation given—and it was a perfectly satisfactory explanation—than I felt that the object which Mr. Speaker had in view was not a mere espionage of this or that group of Members, but simply to afford himself the opportunity of giving that evidence which it is indubitable will have to be given before dealing with the manner in which our Rules and precedents are to be improved. It seems to me we are not bound to go back to precedent to defend Mr. Speaker in the exercise of his private judgment. For the purpose of enabling him to form an opinion, he sets a clerk to perform a duty, which is not, by any means, a duty of an unpleasant character—a duty which is simply statistical. [A laugh.] Hon. Members laugh, because they choose to impute motives to Mr. Speaker. ["No, no!"] If they do not impute motives, what is the meaning of all these proceedings? I say this thing is a mere statistical registration, which is serving Mr. Speaker fairly to initiate a proceeding of another character without any arrière pensée. I defend it, Sir, upon the ground which you have stated, and that is simply that you require this for the information of your own mind and for the purpose of forming a judgment with relation to any change which may be suggested. [MR. SULLIVAN: Against whom?] I say Mr. Speaker is justified by the proceedings which have taken place in this House, even supposing that he had an ulterior motive in taking the action that he did. Therefore, I do not see my way to support the proposition, especially in view of the fact that the Speaker is only the embodiment of the authority, but also of the dignity of this House, and that we have repeatedly seen how often it is placed in peril by the hon. Members who are bringing forward this Motion.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN: Sir, I rise to make a few observations upon one point especially dwelt upon by the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), and by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). Those hon. and learned Gentlemen spoke of the protection which the Forms of the House afforded to a minority; and I think the hon. and learned Member for Louth particularly said "that they were designed in order to prevent a majority crushing a small minority." Now, I suppose, that if there is one thing more dear than another to Englishmen it is the principle of being bound by the decision of the majority; but it is perfectly well known, also, to be an essential principle of our Rules and Regulations that the same question should not be debated twice. If that means anything, it is that the decision of the House having been once taken upon a question, it should not be reverted to and brought forward again. You cannot have a more decisive affirmation of the absolute decision of a majority ruling questions which we bring forward in this House. I desire also to offer a few remarks upon the point which has been brought forward by hon. Members that obstruction was constantly resorted to in former days in this House. After a Parliamentary experience of 27 years, I can say, without hesitation, that I have never known obstruction organized in such a manner to prevent the passage of measures until during the last Parliament, when those hon. Gentlemen who have been alluded to took a certain course with regard to measures introduced by the last Government. I fully remember the very great fear which I entertained concerning the future Business of the House. I said, again and again, that we were straining the Forms of the House in a dangerous manner, and that it could not otherwise result than in very serious consequences to the authority of the House of Commons. The very unfortunate course taken at the period referred to has been persisted in by hon. Members, and exaggerated very largely during the present Parliament. We have a great duty to perform to our country, and we are sent here to legislate for our country's good, and it is not to be supposed that we can so far forget that duty as to permit it to be interfered with by the obstruction offered to the progress of the Business of the House. Therefore, I do not hesitate to warn hon. Gentlemen that it will be absolutely necessary for the great body of the Members of this House carefully to consider in what manner they will prevent the continuance of this distinct and organized obstruction to the performance of their functions and the Business of the country. The delay of measures has now become a science; and hon. Members in adopting that course keep within the Forms of the House of which they have a perfect knowledge; but they, nevertheless, prevent the carrying on of the Business of the country. We have a large number of Orders on the Book, and yet the consideration of one particular measure introduced by the Government has so taken up the time of Parliament that those charged with the responsibilities of Office have found it quite impossible to get through their Business. Such a state of things cannot be allowed to continue. For my own part, I should certainly not wish to see the Forms of the House altered; but some remedy must be found, although the form which it will take must be a matter for grave consideration. The hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) has stated that you, Sir, had "secretly and surreptitiously" placed a stranger in the Gallery to report our proceedings. But that gentleman could be seen from any part of the House, and, surely, it was open to anyone to observe that Notes were being taken. Therefore, I cannot think for an instant that the words "secretly and surreptitiously" can be applied to that proceeding. Sir, I can only say that, charged as you are with the difficult function of presiding over the Business of the House, you are, in my opinion, perfectly justified in the course which you have taken, inasmuch as the Rules and precedents of Parliament are established as they become from time to time necessary.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Sir, I think this is one of those occasions upon which we may regret that some of the forms of Parliamentary procedure in foreign countries are not in existence here. It seems to me that this is eminently an occasion upon which—in France, for instance—a Motion would be made, that the explanation of Mr. Speaker having been received the House should pass to the Business of the day. The only Motion analogous to that which we have is that of moving the Previous Question; and I imagine that if I, or, as I should greatly prefer, some old, experienced, and highly-valued Member of this House, were to make that Motion, the House of Commons, as well as the country, would be spared a very unpleasant issue. With the permission of the House, I will state my reason for considering the issue to be of that character. It is impossible, I think, to treat this matter as a light one, or to put it upon the ground that something has been done by your authority which is a matter of every-day proceeding. We have heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer what, to the majority of hon. Members, has been a revelation, that for many years past a record of the number and duration of the speeches of hon. Members has been kept by the Clerk at the Table, and that such record has been kept for statistical and useful purposes. Now, for my own part, I should like to know something of the history of that record; when it was commenced; at whose instigation it was commenced; whether it has been regularly kept since that time; the number of volumes, who has access to them, and what they contain? But if we accept the explanation which has been given—and I, for one, am far from offering any opposition to it—that record must contain everything which can be desired by Mr. Speaker or by the House. But with what object was that procedure changed? I have no hesitation in avowing my belief that the object was to obtain a record of the proceedings of Members of this House, to be used for penal purposes hereafter. But if it was necessary to have more accurate records than those hitherto kept, why was not the House informed of this necessity? My whole nature revolts at the idea of anything like espionage being introduced into the House of Commons. I feel myself unable to control my emotions when I think that something is being done behind the backs of hon. Members, for the purpose of accomplishing an object which may be either good or bad, but of which we know nothing. Sir, it is not a favourable feature of the closing years of this Parliament that hon. Members should be willing to resort to so un-English a proceeding for the purpose of putting down obstruction caused by the action or language of a small minority of this House. I myself, both in the House and at the expense of some popularity out of it, have expressed my extreme disapprobation at anything in the nature of organized obstruction. I have never taken part in such obstruction, and I have expressed, both through the Press and by word of mouth, my opinion that whenever organized obstruction is practised it must lead to the clôture which is carried on in foreign Assemblies. I am not sure that the plan of silencing hon. Members might not even now be proposed, and that it was not actually proposed by Mr. Bernal Osborne; but if it be necessary to silence hon. Members, surely it is for the Leader of the House to come forward and make the Motion, and allow hon. Members to deal with it. But to put upon hon. Members something in the shape of pressure, through the Speaker of the House, appears to me to be a course unworthy of the House of Commons. Hon. Members on the opposite side of the House would not, perhaps, feel this pressure, because they are Members of a large majority; but it would tell very much against those who are Members of a weak and insignificant minority. Sir, I feel it would be extremely unbecoming in me, as I think it has been unbecoming on the part of several hon. Members, to indulge in panegyrics upon the conduct of the Chair. I have been brought up with the idea that Mr. Speaker was the Representative of the majesty of the Commons of England, and thus it would no more occur to me to dispute his authority, or to question his impartiality, than it would occur to me to question the authority of the Sovereign. For that reason, the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer appears to me particularly objectionable, inasmuch as it would make it appear to be desirable that the House should express an opinion upon the impartiality of Mr. Speaker. Sir, I think this is a matter which ought to pass without question, as I am certain it would pass without question in any Assembly brought together in any part of Her Majesty's Dominions. I think it would be desirable, in the interest of the dignity of the House, and looking to the view which in future may be taken of the record of our proceedings, that this Motion should not be divided upon. Has it come to this—that the House of Commons is about to affirm, on the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it is desirable that confidential information as to the proceedings of Members should be conveyed to Mr. Speaker when he is out of the Chair? I cannot think that our forefathers would have suffered that course. If a Division is taken, whilst I shall vote, as I cannot help voting, in favour of the truism that the course which has been taken is unprecedented, I shall, at the same time, regret that I am prevented doing that which I desire to do—namely, to affirm my complete confidence in the impartiality and honour of Mr. Speaker; for it will be impossible for me to assent to the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which declares that it is desirable that confidential information as to the conduct of Members of the House should be conveyed to the Speaker when he is absent from the Chair. I desire to call the attention of the House to another aspect of this question. If it be necessary to have more accurate information as to what takes place in this House, what is the reason that the House of Commons has so persistently refused to organize a system for reporting our proceedings? While we refuse to have the recognized system of reporting which exists in almost every Legislative Assembly in the world, with what consistency can we vote that it is desirable, or to be tolerated, that an official of the House shall be put into the Gallery to take notes of what is said by hon. Members? But I say that it is not proved that we have not during this very Session organized the proper means to obtain information as to what takes place in Committee. The House will recollect that, in consequence of several Motions which were brought forward at various times with reference to a Report of the proceedings of the House, a Committee was appointed to inquire into the subject, and sat for a very considerable length of time. The House will also recollect that if the newspaper reports of the speeches of hon. Members in debate were defective, and not given at the desired length, it was found that what was said and done in Committee was still more defectively reported, and that, therefore, Mr. Speaker was authorized to enter into arrangements with Mr. Hansard for reporting the proceedings in Committee. Now, I have referred to the report furnished by Mr. Hansard of our proceedings in Committee upon occasions when I have been present, and am able to say that anything more accurate, or more full, cannot possibly be conceived. Those reports are perfectly full and accurate, and, therefore, if it be desired to know how often hon. Members speak, it can be ascertained from the authorized version of our proceedings published by Mr. Hansard; and if it be desired to know what an hon. Member has said, his words will be found accurately recorded in that publication. But if this question of how long and how often hon. Members speak is to be debated in this House, how far back are we to go? Is our inquiry to be confined to the proceedings on the Bill now before the House for the better regulation of the Army? or shall we go back many Sessions, and ask how often the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) spoke in Committee on the Divorce Bill, and inquire how often right hon. Gentlemen opposite spoke on the Ballot Bill? Let me ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) whether there was, or was not, an organized system of obstruction to the progress of the latter measure, which was placed in his charge? Was there any less persistent opposition to its progress through the House in any one of its stages than there has been to the passage of other measures? Take, again, the question of Abolition of Purchase in the Army, and let hon. Members examine their consciences, and say whether they did not do everything in their power to obstruct the Business of the House—for that is the phrase now in use—upon that occasion? The difference between the proceedings of my hon. Friends and the proceedings of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite at that time is that they did not understand their business so well as my hon. Friends understand their business. But if the latter are to be charged with this vice of obstruction, they certainly have the right to refer to the record of the good which they have done. I repeat that, so far from approving of obstruction, I deeply disapprove of it in any form which has not the definite and distinct object of preventing the passage of a measure supposed to be bad, or of promoting the progress of measures supposed to be good. What would have been the condition of prisoners in this country if there had not been persistency on the part of my hon. Friends here in amending the Prisons Bill? I have not the smallest hesitation in saying that certainly one-half, and probably two-thirds, of the Amendments of my hon. Friends to that measure were carried in this House; and I can go further, and say that every one of those Amendments which went to the protection of the liberty of the subject was carried by the persistency of my hon. Friends. Again, to whom is the country indebted for the abolition of the old Mutiny Bill, and the consequent introduction of a mitigated measure by the Government, if it be not entirely to that small minority of hon. Members whom you wish to crush? Further, the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, which it is expected should pass through Parliament without inquiry, has been met by certain Amendments on the part of my hon. Friends characterized as obstructive. But what is the position of this matter? Why, my hon. Friends have carried very nearly one-half of their Amendments, and every one of those has been approved by universal consensus outside this House. Is it for these services rendered to the country that you are now to introduce, for the first time into the House of Commons, a penal record of what my hon. Friends have done? What, I ask, is the object of this record? Is it so to deal with those hon. Members that the fire may be taken out of their speeches, in order that the legislation of the country may proceed without criticism? Sir, I should rejoice if this were Wednesday, instead of Friday; because, in that case, it is quite possible that some hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite would not be able to compress their observations within such a compass as would, by the Forms, allow us to come to any actual conclusion upon the matter before the House. But, as it is, I regret that we shall be called upon to divide upon this Resolution. For my part, I shall vote with the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), for, whether I think his proceedings wise or not, I shall never, as long as I sit in this House, desert his principles. On the other hand, much as I should like to testify the deep and profound respect which I feel for the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, I cannot join the Government in expressing its satisfaction that confidential information has been acquired by means of an organization of officers of this House as to the conduct of hon. Members entitled to address the House of Parliament.

MR. CALLAN: Sir, I do not agree with the wish expressed by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), that this was Wednesday instead of Friday. I wish to go at once to a Division, but desire to express my regret at the manner in which this question was put upon the Paper of the House. I must say, Sir, that it would have been an act of common fairness and courtesy to you, had due Notice been given before the subject was brought forward. I must also express my regret at the manner in which it has been met by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He has not met it as he should have done by a direct negative, but in a manner quite fallacious and evasive, and one which is, besides, in direct conflict with the announcement made from the Chair. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has put in his Amendment that these reports are confidential in their character; whereas you, Sir, stated that you were ready to lay them upon the Table of the House, if hon. Members thought it necessary to move for them as a Return. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich have come forward and said that this is no new course of procedure, but that these Minutes have been taken for a period of 29 years. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that exact Notes were taken since the year 1850 of the times of rising and sitting down of hon. Members. I have in my hand the Book referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which I trust, for the honour of the House, he had not read when he made that statement.

The first entry in which my name occurs relates to—

No hour is here given. This is the first error; and I now turn to the year 1873, when we had a Turnpike Trusts Bill before the House, and amongst those who divided on that occasion I find the Members of the present Government. That was a case of real obstruction. I find the first Teller was the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). The Teller in the next obstructive Motion was the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Lowther); and, again, on the next obstructive Motion, the Teller was the noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade (Viscount Sandon). The Teller in the next Motion against this Turnpike Bill, which was in Committee over six hours, was the Whip of the Conservative Government; and then, as fourth Teller, came the hon. Gentleman who represents the India Office in this House (Mr. E. Stanhope). There is no entry whatever on that occasion of any speech of mine. I turn now to the year 1877, when the House sat for 26 hours on the South Africa Bill, and there is no entry of any speech made upon that Bill. How can we, then, but characterize the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, holding this Book in his hand, as inaccurate, and as a flimsy pretext, misleading to the House? It will be in the memory of the House that, last Monday, I questioned the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this subject, and in his answer he declined all knowledge of these proceedings, referring me to you, Sir. You gave no answer, and, in consequence, I believed then, and continued to do so until you disavowed it, that you were wholly unconnected with the matter in dispute, and that the Notes had been taken by some unauthorized person.

Question put.

MR. SPEAKER: According to the Orders of the House, this Sitting is suspended until Nine o'clock, when this debate will be resumed.

Mr. Callan

And it being Seven of the clock, further Proceeding stood adjourned till this day, and the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE—NOTE-TAKING IN THE MEMBERS' SIDE-GALLERY.

RESOLUTION.

PROCEEDING OF THE HOUSE further resumed.

Question proposed,

“That the words ‘Notice having been taken, while the House was in Committee, of the presence in one of the side Galleries of a gentleman engaged in taking notes of the proceedings of the Committee; and Mr. Speaker having informed the House that the gentleman was an officer of the House, and was so employed under his direction, and that the notes taken by him were for the confidential information of the Speaker, this House is of opinion that Mr. Speaker was justified in the directions given by him, and is entitled to the support and confidence of this House,’ be added, instead thereof.”

MR. GRAY: I beg to propose as an Amendment to the said proposed Amendment to leave out all the words after “this House,” in line 7, in order to insert the words—

“Declares that the practice of this House prescribes that the Clerk Assistant do not take any notes here without the precedent directions and commands of the House, but only of the Orders and Reports made in the House, and that the entry of the Clerk of particular men's speeches was without warrant at all times.”

After the Division, Sir, which was taken in the early part of the day, I should not have thought it desirable to test the opinion of this House upon this question any further, but that I do not think the issue raised by the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and by the original Motion now negatived, puts the question before the House in distinct and unmistakable terms. Instead of drafting a Resolution in my own terms, I have taken the words from previous solemn declarations of the House, which hon. Members opposite will, therefore, either have in terms to negative, or in terms to endorse. I find, Sir, from reference to Hatsell's Precedents, that on the 17th of April, 1628, one of those musty precedents, which hon. Gentlemen opposite will now have to destroy—

“That the entry of the Clerk of particular Members' speeches was without warrant at all times.”

Now, that is a declaration of the House, which, of course, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs, and of other hon. Gentlemen, has probably become musty. Therefore, the sooner it is removed from our precedents the better the noble Lord and other hon. Gentlemen will be pleased. The Amendment I propose will enable them distinctly to destroy this musty precedent. I find that Hatsell also declares in terms—

“That the Clerk ought to take notes of nothing but Orders and Reports of the House.”

This, also, is a precedent, which the sooner it is destroyed the easier we shall get on with our new mode of conducting Business. On the 25th of April, 1640, it was—I think this has been quoted before, and it is the last time it will be quoted in this House, because it is to be destroyed—that our Predecessors solemnly ruled—

“That their Clerk Assistant do not take any notes here without the precedent directions and commands of this House, but only Reports or Orders made in the House.”

Now, we have introduced new precedents from to-day, and I am desirous that hon. Members shall in terms, by their votes, destroy this precedent. This is—in 1640—of course, a very old and musty precedent. No doubt, this matter is a very serious one, and it is no good cloaking from ourselves that the proposition to which I invite the House is, more or less, in the nature of a censure on the Chair. I very deeply regret to have to vote censure upon the Chair, or to propose an Amendment which means the same thing. However, I do feel very decidedly, with all respect to yourself, Sir, and the position which you occupy that on this occasion you have exceeded the powers which you up to yesterday possessed, though, probably, if you acted in the same manner this evening, you would not exceed your powers, after the vote of to-day. I find, on the 9th April, 1620, another musty precedent, which we will clear away—

“That the Speaker is but the servant of the House, and not the master nor the master's mate, and ought to respect the meanest Member as well as those about the Chair.”

The respect of every Member also probably means that every Member will respect the Chair. [“Hear, hear!”] Well, for myself, I yield to none of the hon. Members who call “Hear, hear!” in respect to the Chair, and I yield to none of them in respect for the precedents of this House. But I do not believe it is properly within the function of the Chair to destroy this precedent without the authority of the House; and that is the reason why, very briefly, I shall ask the House, by negating my Resolution, to destroy these musty old precedents. Now, Sir, several speakers to-day suggested that the action of which complaint has been made was merely one for which no precedent could be found against it, but that it was not against precedent. I really think the quotations which I have read from the Journals of the House prove distinctly that it was a distinct violation of precedents; that it was, in terms, a violation of the Ordinances of the House. If those Orders, by being observed for 200 or 300 years, by never having been deviated from during that time, have thereby become obsolete, then, of course, the proceeding was within the function of Mr. Speaker to carry out; but if a precedent, the longer it is observed the stronger it becomes, then, the fact that for 200 years it has never been departed from, so far would make it deserving to be treated with respect, on the ground of the traditions of this House, as well as the liberties of hon. Members. And there was a certain amount of want of candour in the way in which it was discussed to-day. In the explanation with which you favoured the House, and which has been put into print, in order that there shall be no mistake made about it, you frequently and distinctly declared that you adopted exceptional courses, in order to meet exceptional circumstances. That, of course, was entirely the fact; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer explained that it was merely carrying out a system which had been in force ever since 1850. [“No, no!" I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say so; and the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs distinctly took up the same inference from the speech, and stated that this had been a practice which had continued in operation since 1850. I think the explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was certainly calculated to leave that impression on the minds of hon. Members. That, no doubt, was contrary to the fact that it was only introduced within the last day or two. I do not intend to trouble the House with any long speech on this Motion. I am only desirous to put the matter plainly and distinctly before the House. If these old Privileges are to be abolished, if these precedents are to be swept away, let them be swept away in terms; and let the hon. Gentlemen who voted against the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) vote also, in terms, to destroy these old musty precedents quoted in my Resolution. I was desirous to bring this matter forward; but I have done so very briefly, and will give to hon. Members, as soon as they desire it, a Division on the question, for it is not my desire to obstruct other Business on the Paper for to-night. I have never stood up to speak against time, or to interfere with the Business on the Paper. I simply place a plain issue before the House, to vote "Aye" or "No" upon it. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out from the words "this House," in line 7 of the proposed Amendment, to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "declares that the practice of this House prescribes that the Clerk Assistant do not take any notes here without the precedent directions and commands of the House, but only of the Orders and Reports made in the House, and that the entry of the Clerk of particular men's speeches was without warrant at all times,"—
(Mr. Gray.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR OSBORNE MORGAN: I had hoped, after the crushing majority of this morning, a majority more decisive than any I ever remember, that my hon.

Mr. Gray

Friends below me would have been content with spoiling, if not our temper, at least our dinner and our digestion, and would have allowed this matter to pass; particularly as the result of bringing this Motion forward will not be to obstruct Government Business, but to obstruct the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don). It has, however, been thought necessary to renew the challenge; and I suppose we must meet it. I am bound to say of this charge that I do not think I ever saw so great a hubbub about so small a matter.

"This Liberal ocean into tempest tossed,
To waft a feather, or to drown a fly."

The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) referred to 1640, and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) confesses his readiness to go to the Tower, and to follow the example of Pym and Hampden. Why, he might as well express readiness to be hung, drawn, and quartered on Temple Bar. Is there, in the whole of Europe, a single legislative or deliberative Assembly, the Rules of which are so free, and offer so much liberty of discussion, as those of this House? I will ask, again, is there a single Legislative Assembly which sits under so beneficial and mild a rule as yours? I think, if my hon. Friends had a taste of the iron rule of M. Gambetta, they would soon find out the difference. Then, why is this debate to be prolonged? I am not like the hon. Member for Stoke (Dr. Kenealy), or the hon. and learned Baronet opposite (Sir George Bowyer), and I do not pretend to be a Constitutional lawyer; in fact, I do not know what that is; but I have had the honour of sitting in this House nearly 11 years, and I have always understood that the ruling of Mr. Speaker upon questions of internal management or arrangement was a thing supreme, and could not be questioned. You have given your explanation, Sir, and, I may say, a fairer or more straightforward explanation I have never heard; and we are bound to receive it. I say we are accustomed—even hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway are accustomed—to associate the honour and fair name of the House of Commons with the honour and fair name of Mr. Speaker; and in supporting your authority we are supporting the authority of the House of Commons. Then, what are they afraid of? Surely, they are crying out before they are hit. When this "terrorism" is sought to be exercised, then, and not till then, it will be time for them to speak. In the meantime, as I do not want to prolong the debate, I will only say this—that it will be a bad day for this country, and a bad day for England, and, allow me to add, a bad day for Ireland, when the authority of the Chair, particularly on a question of this kind, comes to be called in question.

MR. BIGGAR: During the progress of this debate, I have been rather startled by some propositions laid down by hon. Members. The hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian), who spoke earlier this evening, laid it down that if a Division were against the minority the minority should not consider whether it was right or wrong, or in Order, and should not ask for any further decision on the question for all time to come. That was his experience of 26 or 27 years of Parliamentary life; but, surely, the hon. Gentleman must have occupied his time very strangely, if he does not know that all the great questions have been carried, ultimately, after having been supported by very small minorities at the early stages of the proceedings. With reference to the practical question before us to-night, we have been treated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the noble Lord who leads the Whigs, to a false issue. The issue is not whether we have confidence in you; but whether, by the advice of certain parties, you introduced a new system without asking the sanction of the House? The question of reporting in this House was discussed at some length in the House last Session, and the House refrained from giving any decision on that question; and for that reason I think it is still more undesirable to introduce any new system without asking the consent of the House.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: In this cricket week, when so many hon. Members have been studying cricket, a little anecdote may illustrate what has brought about a good deal of debate. I was once talking to a gentleman acquainted with an hon. Member in this House, at that time rising into some public notoriety, and in the course of conversation I was told he was a hard hitter, a good block, a bold twister, but that he always quarrelled with the umpire. I cannot help thinking that there is a little desire to quarrel with the umpire in the whole of these proceedings.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT: We are talking of proceedings of this House not open to hon. Members. We have the reports of Hansard, and any Member can correct any speech he may make. Then, again, we have the reports in the public Press, and any Member may correct errors in the public Press; but if we have an official Report here, of which we are kept in the dark, and it is not open to Members of this House, in future, some extraordinary sentiments might be produced and attached to individuals which they never uttered at all. One other remark I wish to make. I think it unfortunate that the authorities of this House should, at any time, take any course which serves only to produce irritation in the House, and which does not control whatever evil may be complained of, and which even does not tend to control that evil. According to these views I have voted, and fully explained the vote I am about to give.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: I quite understood that there was no objection whatever to produce those Notes which were taken; and, therefore, that is a complete answer to my hon. Friend (Mr. Jacob Bright). I do not rise to prolong this discussion, because I think this House is anxious to proceed to Business; but reference has been made by several speakers to those Members who sit below the Gangway, and, therefore, I just wish to say, as one who generally occupies that position, that I believe that the great majority who sit here entirely agree with the rest of the House in the decision which they have already come to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I wish to say a very few words. I think it is necessary to take notice of an observation or two which has fallen from a hon. Member below the Gangway, because I think he misunderstood a reference or two I made to another Book, which has been kept for the last 30 years, or thereabouts, and which I mentioned in answer to the Motion of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). It seemed to imply, though it was impossible to refer to all precedents, that no Notes should be taken in this House, except the Notes which are taken on the Table, and are circulated in the morning. I did not refer to those Notes which are taken, and have been taken for the last 30 years, as being an exact precedent for what is done, but in order to show that it had been the habit for many years to take Notes, which are not circulated with the Notes in the morning, and I referred to them, and mentioned that these Books did contain very much the same amount of information as I understood from the description that the Notes recently taken contained. ["No!"] Then, these Notes contain something more. Well, the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) afterwards obtained one of these Books—not the one I was quoting from—the only one I had seen of the date of 1850—and he mentioned, what was quite correct with regard to it—that it contains the name of every speaker, and it contains the hour at which he rose and sat down, and, therefore, that, of course, showed the hours and minutes he spoke. I believe the later Books do not contain all these particulars. The information I quoted is from the early Books; and some others I have since seen contain a record of the time for which every Member spoke. The hon. Member for Dundalk also observed that some speeches he had recently made were not referred to; but, as I understand, this Book was kept only of the proceedings of this House, and not of the Committee. It appears that, of the Notes recently taken, the first are taken during the Sitting of the House, and are convenient as showing what Members have spoken in the debate, and, therefore, showing what Members have a right to speak. The question I raised was not a question whether the proceedings to which attention had been drawn was a mere continuation of that practice; but I pointed out it was not correct to say that there was no other form in which Notes were taken, except these Notes which are taken and printed. I do not think it is at all necessary to go into any further discussion; but I would point out that, in the Amendment placed on the Paper, I do distinctly raise the question whether Mr. Speaker was or was not justified in the directions given, and I maintain he was so justified. I understand the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) to propose to condemn these words, and to declare point blank that he was not justified. I do not at all object to that issue; I think it is right and proper to raise it, for there can be no doubt, if my Amendment is adopted, that the House will declare that such Notes as these now taken may be legitimately taken at the orders of Mr. Speaker, and that the House approves and sanctions such proceedings. I think there can then be no complaint as to ambiguity. I have endeavoured by rising at once in this way to go to the matter of which complaint has been made, and distinctly to ask the House to justify that proceeding. I do not see how that can be called evasion, and I hope we shall have a clear verdict upon the question.

MR. CALLAN: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has taken the earliest opportunity to remove the injurious effect which my explanation and his statement must have caused. A statement made to-day was incorrect, and, in almost every particular, misleading, and it does not become the Leader of this House flippantly to make such a statement before this House. ["Oh, oh!"] Flippantly, I say, as to the character of documents which he is now obliged to confess he did not examine, except by casually looking into a Book placed before him. Casually looking at the Book, also, I saw it was incorrect; and when I brought it down I saw—for I have a fairly retentive memory—that there were no entries made when this House was sitting in Committee, while these of which we now complain are taken in Committee. There are two points to which I wish to allude—first, the Resolution proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which is, in very fact, the opposite to the statement you made that the documents are open for any hon. Member, and that if anyone thought fit to move for them, you would ask the House to grant them as an unopposed Return. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, after hearing that statement, thought fit to trammel and fetter your discretion by a Resolution that these Notes are for your confidential information. If only for your information, the purpose for which they are taken is not yet revealed, and I regret some person on the Government or front Opposition Bench has not been authorized by others who have not a right to speak in this House to state that the rumour to which I alluded last night is incorrect. I had hoped that the Chief Clerk at the Table would have authorized some Member of the Government, or some Members of the front Opposition Bench, to state that no use has been made of these Notes; that no consultation has been held upon them for the purpose of adopting measures against Members of this House. That is the gravamen of the charge, that the Notes have been inspected by the Clerk at the Table, and that other paid officers have been consulted as to what steps should be taken for indicting Members of this House for their conduct in this House. I hope, for his own honour and independence, he will give that statement contradiction.

MR. A. MARTEN: I think the charge made is most unfounded. The hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) accuses the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whom everyone, irrespective of Party, must desire to maintain in his position, of having made a most flippant statement. That is a phrase which I confess I think is one which the hon. Member, if he had consulted his own self-respect, ought not to have addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Of course, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who transacts his Business before the faces of all of us, will, I am quite sure, feel when such a charge is brought against him that it is totally unfounded. But with regard to the particular circumstances of the matter with respect to which the language was used, what was the statement made by him with reference to the Notes which for a series of years have been taken with regard to what passes in this House? ["Divide, divide!"] I beg the attention of the House to this point, because it is necessary to be considered, in order that the nature of the charge, and the facts with regard to the previous history of the Notes taken in this House may be thoroughly understood. For nearly 30 years it has been the practice that Notes should be taken, not of all debates, or of all proceedings, but of most of the principal debates which have occurred in the House, as distinguished from proceedings in Committee. It is quite true that these Notes have not been taken with regard to proceedings in Committee, and have not been taken with regard to all the proceedings in this House; but with reference to the Notes being taken occasionally and not continuously, I may point out to that fact as furnishing a complete answer to the statement made by the hon. Member for Dundalk, early in the day, by which he professed to be able to point out numerous deficiencies in these Notes, which he said he had compared with various proceedings within his own experience. [Mr. CALLAN: I made no such statement.] If I am in Order, I am in the recollection of the House, when I say the hon. Member for Dundalk did make a reference to these Notes being imperfect. The explanation of that supposed imperfection is that these Notes were taken, not in Committee or on all occasions, but were taken only during actual debates of importance in this House. I myself have had the opportunity of referring to these Notes. They consist of a list of speakers with a list of the hours at which they rose, and, occasionally, there are notes—brief notes—which refer to some matters which are supposed to be of some use to Mr. Speaker. These Notes were taken solely for the benefit of Mr. Speaker himself; and to enable him to preserve a record in the cases in which they were taken of the debates before him in the House. I quite agree that none of them refer to the proceedings in Committee; but they are of essentially the same character as the Notes which have now been taken in Committee; and you, Sir, were pleased to inform the House, when the matter was called in question—on having your attention brought to the fact that the proceedings on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill did occupy an extraordinary amount of time—that you desired, for your own information, to know what was occurring. With regard to the position of the Speaker during Committees, there is this most important observation to be made—that when Mr. Speaker leaves the Chair, though generally he is believed to be, and during long Committees is, absent from the House, yet, very frequently, during brief Committees, he sits on the Treasury Bench. He is, however, in theory, always supposed to be present, and by the Rules is entitled to resume the Chair to decide any point which suddenly arises, or requires his interposition to preserve Order. It follows that, as Mr. Speaker is himself supposed to be present, he is supposed to be cognizant of everything that goes on; and when any question arises, without any special report made to him, to know what is occurring. No doubt, when the Committee confirms a Resolution, the Committee reports that vote to Mr. Speaker, not for his personal information, but to him as the Representative of the House. The Committee reports, and when Mr. Raikes reports to Mr. Speaker he represents the Committee in making a formal Report of the proceedings to Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker then communicates it to the House, and the House makes an Order with regard to the order of the proceedings. That is entirely different from his knowledge of what goes on as a Member of this House, and also different from his knowledge, occupying the highest position as he does, of what goes on in Committee. If I am not wearying the House, I may refer to a very important statement made in April, 1814, on the question of the speech made by the Speaker of that day. The question there arose as to what was the position of the Speaker with regard to the Committee. Now, if I may be permitted, without wearying the House, to read a few words from the debate I should like to do so, because they deal with a most important matter—namely, the exact position of Mr. Speaker with regard to the House itself. Of course, in all my observations I do not refer to Select Committees and Committees upstairs, but to Committees of the Whole House. On the 22nd of April, 1814, the then Speaker (Mr. Abbot), in his address to the House, discussed the technical objection that the Speaker can know nothing of what passes in a Committee, either as to the proceeding or as to the reasons on which the proceeding is founded. That was the objection taken. The answer made by Mr. Speaker Abbot was, that it was strictly his duty to be there “as Speaker,” and to be cognizant of all that passes, although, by indulgence, his absence may be excused—

“And it is so much his duty to be present that, if necessary, he may (as has happened in my own time), upon his own observation of what is passing, and upon his own responsibility take the Chair ‘as Speaker’ without the leave of the House, to put an end to any disorder that may arise in the Committee.”—[1 Hansard, xxvii.483.]

I will not read further; but that proves that Mr. Speaker is as a Member of the House, and is also, “as Speaker,” conscious of everything that goes on in Committee. Physically, it is impossible for Mr. Speaker, with his onerous duties, to remain here during the many hours we are in Committee. It would be a most intolerable burden to place on him, in addition to the enormous Public Business which weighs upon him, and has to be transacted every Session, that he should also be present during the whole of the proceedings of every Committee. Therefore, he is perfectly justified, on the most technical grounds, for his own information, in obtaining these Notes which have been taken of proceedings in Committee. Now, the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) produced, with a great deal of ceremony and emphasis, precedents which rather chime in with us on this side. He inferred from some cheers which he heard that we thought them musty precedents of no value. I say that I entertain the highest respect—no one can entertain a higher respect than I do—for precedents, especially precedents with regard to the proceedings of this most ancient and honourable Assembly. But the precedents with which we are acquainted all prove that although, from time to time, there have arisen difficulties in maintaining the discipline of the House and in carrying on the Public Business, yet, from time immemorial, the House has always asserted its authority over individual Members, and invariably, in the end, notwithstanding many difficulties and much delay, has proved successful. With regard to the particular precedents cited, there was one on the 17th April, 1628. All I understand that to refer to is that the Clerk at the Table is not to take a shorthand note of everything which occurs in this Sitting. I want to ask the hon. Member how is that applicable to the present case? Because the complaint is that a verbatim report is not taken. We are told that if we were to have a verbatim note taken of our proceedings, and these Notes were published, hon. Members opposite would be only too delighted, as there would then be a full report to the nation of all that took place here. They would be right glad, they say, to challenge the House to the issue that everything they have done has been entirely justified by the motive which actuated them, or by the object; but I say all this is totally inapplicable to what we are now considering. If the Clerks were to begin taking Notes of particular speeches, then it is possible that that precedent, if antiquated and old, yet none the less worthy of respect now than it was at that time—that that precedent might be put in force. But I should like to know what pretence there is for suggesting that any officer of the House of Commons is taking Notes of particular Member's speeches? The complaint is that they do not do it; but that merely a Note is taken of the names and number of times that hon. Members rise, and the time they occupy, not of what they say. No attempt has been made to go into the details of this precedent. But I believe it will be found that the precedent of 1628 was the time when shorthand notes were coming into vogue, and were extremely popular. We have preserved to us diaries taken by Members at that period. I can point also to law books, in which are contained verbatim reports of the proceedings which took place in those days. These, then, were the first times that verbatim reports were introduced, and, no doubt, the complaint was that the Clerk at the Table was exercising his skill as a shorthand writer in taking down particular speeches, and not attending to the duties incumbent upon him of recording the Orders of the House. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, I think that may be so. The next precedent referred to is the 25th April, 1640—we do not come to these precedents in order of dates, but quite promiscuously—and that is that the Clerk Assistant do not take any Note of the proceedings of the House, except with the sanction of the House. Now, as I understand it, that was a precedent of the same description as that of the 17th April, 1628. It was, of course, immediately after the meeting of the Long Parliament in the reign of Charles I. It was immediately upon that assembling, and I have no doubt it was merely a repetition of the precedent of 1628, and was to prevent the Clerk from doing that which would interfere with his ordinary avocations. It merely said the Clerk Assistant; it did not refer to the Clerk. Another precedent referred to was the 9th March, 1620, which will go back to James I. There, as I understand, the precedent is thus laid down that Mr. Speaker was bound to respect every Member of this House. I appeal to both sides of the House, and to all sections of the House, confidently, whether our Mr. Speaker does not most impartially respect every Member? It is quite clear that in the time of James I., 1620, that that was a time when most violent struggles were going on with regard to Imperial, Constitutional, and social questions; and I have not the slightest doubt that the origin of that Rule had no reference whatever to a gentleman in the Gallery taking an occasional memorandum with regard to those persons who might address the House, but was addressed to some act indicating a supposed partiality of the Speaker with regard to different quarters of the House, or to different Members of the House and the Government. That precedent merely was that Mr. Speaker is bound to respect every Member, and to afford to him, whether seated below Mr. Speaker or above him, according to the old arrangement of places, fair respect. I ask the House, in confidence, what is the value of these precedents? I say that if they were in point and useful I should be the first to advocate their being upheld. But I say they have nothing whatever to do with the present subject. To bring forward this Resolution is to give the entire go-by to the main question put forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the Amendment proposed, and to attempt to raise a false issue, having nothing to do with the present question. That question, as I venture to say, is of the very simplest description. Although the matter is a very small one, it is capable of being looked at from a high Constitutional point of view. I apprehend everyone in this House must be interested in preserving the ancient and historic grandeur, splendour, and reputation of this House. It is the one historic and ancient House which, through evil and through good repute, and under every opposition and difficulty, through popular agitation or popular indifference, has always managed to preserve that freedom of debate and that moderation of conduct which ought to characterize a great national Assembly. I venture to say that we may appeal to our ancient position, as showing that no Assembly in the whole history of the world has ever been formed, which combined full liberty with thorough efficiency, better than is attained in this House of Commons; and I think we may congratulate ourselves that on the present occasion Mr. Speaker has been supported by a majority, showing that confidence in him which his conduct hitherto most unquestionably has deserved from everybody in the House. I trust that the Amendment will be rejected by a very overwhelming majority.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Sir, I do not want to bring any charge of flippancy against any Member on the Ministerial Bench. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the course of the speech which he made, put the matter before the House in a most straightforward and comprehensive manner. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that this has been a very disagreeable debate for all of us; it is certainly a painful pleasure to me to get up and speak upon a question of this kind, after listening to the long debate which we have had; still, this life is full of disagreeable things, and disagreeable things must be borne with. I found it very unpleasant to walk into the Lobby an hour or two before dinner with the minority; but I felt that no other course was open to me. I came down to the House perfectly uncertain as to the course I should adopt in this matter; but I listened to the debate, and, after hearing the arguments on both sides of the question, I formed the opinion that no answer had been given to the Motion of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) said that the question was, whether we had or had not confidence in you, Sir? But I think that was hardly a fair way of putting it, because I believe I speak the mind of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, when I say that there is no one of them who has not perfect confidence in you. The question in my view is, whether a certain practice which you sanctioned the other day is a practice which ought to be sanctioned by us or not? I will only say there is one thing I pay more regard to than to you; and that is the truth; and, therefore, I am bound to vote for what I believe to be the truth. I was astonished to hear an argument which has been brought forward to-day by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and by hon. Members on the other side of the House.

Mr. A. Marten

They insist that we shall not be guided by these old precedents of 200 years ago. But I believe the maintaining of these old-established and well-considered Rules of the House is one of the safeguards of the liberty of the country, and I am convinced that we shall do a very bad day's work indeed when we make any change in them. I say it is just as important to preserve the rights and liberties of any five Members who sit below the Gangway, who may annoy us by dividing over and over again, as it was to preserve the rights and liberties of Members 200 years ago. I thank the House for hearing the few remarks which I have made upon this unpleasant subject. The only honour I hope to enjoy is to be an independent Member of this House, and I am sure I could not be that, unless I took every opportunity of protesting against anything which endangers the liberty of the House.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: Sir, I think that the Division which has taken place to-day, of upwards of 400 against 29, ought to be final. We have been told that we are not to talk about ancient and musty precedents as protecting the rights of Members of this House. Now, although I have always relied upon ancient precedents, and would be the last person in the world to speak against them, I feel it is necessary to consider them with reference to the circumstances of the time when those precedents were established. But, Sir, we have had a number of precedents referred to which have nothing whatever to do with the question before the House. The most important of these was that on the occasion of King Charles I. coming into the House, and asking Mr. Speaker Lenthall where certain Members were when Mr. Speaker took that course which was, no doubt, incumbent upon him, and said—"I can see only with the eyes of the House, and I can speak only with the tongue of the House." In saying this, he was, no doubt, perfectly right; but is it meant that, because Mr. Speaker Lenthall refused to answer a question put to him by the King, that you, Sir, have no discretion whatever to give orders with regard to matters affecting the Business and usage of the House? This precedent has nothing to do with the present question. Let us look at the particular case before the House. A Committee of the House was appointed to consider the subject of the Business of the House, and Mr. Speaker was called upon to give evidence before that Committee; Mr. Speaker could not give the Committee that accurate and exhaustive information with regard to the proceedings of the House which it was desirable that he should give, and, therefore, he has considered it expedient and useful, in order to the discharge of the duties of his high Office, to obtain accurate reports of what is taking place in the House. Now, what could be more reasonable than that he should take measures to obtain an accurate, official, and responsible record of the proceedings of the House? It was perfectly right that he should do so. But how can anybody compare this case with the precedent of Mr. Speaker Lenthall, who refused to answer a question put to him by the King, as to where were those Members who had offended him? The case is perfectly irrelevant. I admit that the precedents of the time when the Privileges of the House of Commons were in question are of great importance; but I say that in using those precedents we are bound to consider the circumstances which surrounded them. There was, at the period in question, a contest between the Privileges of Parliament and the Prerogative of the Crown. Parliament then most jealously guarded its Privileges as against the Prerogative of the Crown for this reason—that Members of the House of Commons were sometimes called to account for expressions used by them in the House in the discharge of their duties. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary, at that time, for the liberty of Parliament, that its proceedings should not be published, and it became a Breach of Privilege to publish anything that took place within the House, for the obvious reason that Members could not speak their minds freely, unless they were sure that what they said in Parliament would not reach those authorities who would make them responsible for their utterances. But what is the case now? No one fears the Prerogative of the Crown; and although my hon. Friends opposite have spoken of terrorism, I ask whether terrorism is feared by any one of us, and whether there is a Member of this House who fears to speak his mind freely upon any subject which is brought before Parliament? A Member of this House only fears the authority of the Chair; as long as he is in Order; no Member has any reason to fear, or does fear, to say anything which he considers it his duty to say; and, therefore, he possesses the greatest liberty of speech, without restraint or respect of person. I need not enter into the question of whether unnecessary delays are to occur, or whether remedies are to be used for the purpose of preventing them. It may be useful—no doubt, it is useful—that Mr. Speaker should have accurate statistical information with regard to the proceedings in this House; and I contend that it was in the discretion of Mr. Speaker to decide whether that information was, or was not, desirable and useful. This House is deeply interested in the discharge of the duties of Mr. Speaker, and the Business of the House could not proceed unless these were accurately discharged. Therefore, I maintain that what has been done is not in the interest either of Mr. Speaker or of the Government, but in the interest of the House of Commons. I say that to call it a breach of the Privileges of the House is a most absurd and monstrous proposition. We have gentlemen sitting above us who report the proceedings of the House; the existence of reporters has now become a Constitutional matter, and, contrary to the necessities of former times, we now wish our constituents to know what we are doing; we are responsible to them, and we are obliged to the organs of the Press for making known to them our opinions, our speeches, and our votes. That being so, an essential difference exists between our time and the times when it was necessary to conceal the proceedings of Parliament for the purposes of protecting Members from the power of the Prerogative of the Crown and the Star Chambers, which would have made them responsible for their speeches and votes. Again, it is most monstrous and absurd to say that Mr. Speaker wished to introduce into the House any system of espionage by employing an officer of the House to report what was going on in Committee on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill. How can there be espionage with regard to what is spoken in the presence of the representatives of the Press and in the presence of strangers in the Gallery? The statement is ridiculous. And, now, with regard to the position of hon. Members opposite, I must say that having such a futile and miserable case I recommend them, if they would consult their own dignity and the interest of Ireland, to abandon this topic, and withdraw from the position which they have assumed.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Sir, I will not venture formally to ask you a question with respect to the books now circulating about the House, one of which, called The Speech Book, I have seen; but I wish for some information upon that subject which you may possibly be able to afford. The book which I have seen contains, under various headings and chapters, abstracts of the debates which have taken place in the House whilst you were in the Chair, and attached to these headings there are, in some cases, merely the names of Members who spoke. In other cases there are entries of the time as well as the names, which would afford you information as to the time occupied by particular speakers. It is very important that you should have every information as to the proceedings of the House which you may require; but I ask, why, if the system just now originated is more accurate than the former, it was never adopted before? If, however, the information now obtained is of precisely the same character as that which has been obtained formerly, I ask what is the meaning of the, to my mind, exceedingly objectionable phrase in the Resolution of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "For the confidential information of the Speaker?" How long is this information to remain confidential, and is it to remain so until somebody asks a question concerning it, and Mr. Speaker chooses to make answer? I should feel much less difficulty if it was stated that this was a matter for the information of Mr. Speaker which that high officer would use in the House as he pleased. By adopting the word "confidential," we should actually prevent Mr. Speaker, if the Resolution were passed, from making public those reports, and that seems to me a thing which we ought not to sanction. I also desire to know where the records hitherto taken have been kept in former times; have they been kept by the Clerk at the Table, or by some other officer of the House, and are they exactly the same as the records hitherto kept by the Clerk at the Table? Sir, I feel that without the information for which I ask I shall be unable to vote intelligibly upon this Motion.

MR. GILES: Sir, in rising to say a few words on the question of precedent, I merely wish to remark that it has appeared to me, in the numerous debates in this House, that there is too great a straining after precedent. We have had to-night a precedent quoted of 240 years old. In railway engineering, one in 240 is considered the angle of repose, and I think the musty precedent of 240 years might very well repose in the musty volume from which it was extracted. If we were to be entirely guided by precedent, where would have been our railways, our steamboats, and our telegraphs? And, if we carry precedent to its natural conclusion we should never have anything new. If the hon. Gentlemen opposite insist upon having a precedent, let them take the unprecedented precedent of this evening's vote and accept that as a precedent for their future guidance.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, it had been the custom, extending over 30 years, for the Clerk at the Table to take down the names of hon. Members who spoke, and the time during which they spoke. If, therefore, Mr. Speaker was not in the Chair, was there any reason why, for his information, the same course should not be pursued? But now they were taken back to the 17th century for precedents the other way; but that period was not one to which the House of Commons should, in his opinion, look for precedents. In that century there was a struggle between the House in support of its liberties and the Crown; and, naturally, one of the things about which the House was exceedingly careful was that the Crown should not know what was said by individual Members. Happily, all that had passed away. They had now a large number of newspapers reporting each day the speeches of hon. Members; and there was in the House a Gallery set apart for members of the Press. What need had they, then, to go back to the 17th century for guides and precedents? He believed that the country was amazed at the obstruction which had taken place; and he ventured to say that if such a charge were to be brought against the Government, that they had obstructed the Public Business, it would only rebound against hon. Members who had really adopted that course. He also ventured to suggest to hon. Members for Ireland that they should re-consider the policy which they had so long pursued. There were before the House several Bills in which they were interested, among them the Irish Education Bill; and there were also a number of English Bills, such as the Valuation Bill and the County Boards Bill; and it was obvious that if hon. Members from Ireland would give cordial assistance in getting measures through the House, English Members would do all they could to assist them in carrying their own measures. He ventured to hope that hon. Members from Ireland would now make some change in their tactics, and they would find that their time had not been wasted.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That Notice having been taken while the House was in Committee, of the presence in one of the side Galleries of a gentleman engaged in taking notes of the proceedings of the Committee; and Mr. Speaker having informed the House that the gentleman was an officer of the House, and was so employed under his direction, and that the notes taken by him were for the confidential information of the Speaker, this House is of opinion that Mr. Speaker was justified in the directions given by him, and is entitled to the support and confidence of this House.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

IRELAND—TRAINING OF TEACHERS IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

RESOLUTION.

THE O'CONOR DON, in rising to call attention to the training of the Teachers in Elementary Schools in Ireland, and to move—

"That, considering the very large proportion of untrained Teachers in charge of Elementary Schools in Ireland, and the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Primary Education which reported in 1868, it is desirable that steps should be immediately taken by Her Majesty's Government to give effect to the Resolution in regard to Grants to Training Schools adopted by the Board of National Education in Ireland in December 1874;"

said, the question to which he wished to ask the attention of the House, although not of the burning character of the educational topics lately submitted, was still one of very considerable importance. They had lately been considering the condition of higher education in Ireland. He desired now to call attention to the other end of the educational course, and the matters connected with the interests and well-being of the schools frequented by the children of the large mass of the population. He felt sure it would be admitted that no point in connection with these schools was of more importance than the character and fitness of the teachers who presided in them, and he thought it would also be very generally granted that teaching itself was an art, that it required to be learned, that training and instruction should precede practice, and that it was not every young lad or girl who passed through a school that was capable of undertaking its management. It would scarcely be denied, he thought, that to have successful teaching there should be competent teachers, and in order to secure these there must be established some system of preliminary training. No truth was more fully recognized by the founders of the National system of education in Ireland than this one. For the purpose of carrying out this training an institution was established in Marlborough Street, Dublin, shortly after the National system of education was founded. It was first opened for males, and subsequently for females, and it had been in working operation for nearly 40 years. Subsequently, at various times, district and minor model schools were founded, all under the control and management of the Board of Education, and upon these schools £50,000 a-year was now spent. As already stated, according to the Report of the Royal Commission, a residence of two years was contemplated, and he would now like to ask attention to the actual facts regarding the duration of the training. In England and Scotland two years was the duration of the training; but in Ireland, as a matter of fact, the ordinary training lasted only five months, and, in many instances, only four months. Beyond that, short as it was, it was most miserably defective. Mr. Marshall, one of the English Inspectors, referred to the teachers who had spent four or five months in the Dublin training school as "virtually untrained." Mr. Connor, another Inspector, referred to them in the same sense; and Mr. O'Hara stated that very little difference could be found between trained and untrained teachers. But not only was the length of training wretched, but the numbers who took advantage of this wretched training were very small. In considering this part of the subject he would have to go back a little on the history of the question. In June, 1866, more than 13 years ago, Lord Carlingford, then Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Chief Secretary for Ireland, wrote as follows to the Commissioners on National Education:—

"I am desired by His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, to inform you that Her Majesty's Government have had under their consideration several important questions connected with the operation of the National system of education in Ireland. The first question which they request the Board to consider is that of the training of the teachers of the model schools. It was originally laid down by Lord Derby, as a condition of the employment of teachers, that they should receive previous instruction in the normal school which was established in Dublin in 1833; but the Commissioners of Education, having this one normal school only, and having a large and increasing number of teachers to train, were forced to adopt a very limited course of instruction, a course which at first was spread over three months only, and which has never exceeded five months, and notwithstanding this effort to extend, however imperfectly, the influences of training as widely as possible, it appears that there are still in the National Schools 4,369 untrained teachers out of a total of 7,472. It is, of course, known to the Government that the district model schools assist in supplying competent teachers; but the number they are able to send out does not, it appears, exceed 90, while in 34 out of 60 school districts no model school has been established. It is accordingly ascertained that between the training school in Dublin and the district model schools in the country the number of persons prepared for the office of teacher is only about 400, whereas the number of new teachers annually required is 900. The Government view this state of things with much concern, and are anxious to apply a remedy for the incompleteness and inadequacy of the present training."

Here they had the position of affairs at that time very clearly laid down by the responsible Minister of the Crown. The training, he stated, was inadequate both as to duration and extent. It lasted only five months, and was not participated in by the majority of the teachers; and that, he stated, was regarded with much concern by the Government. The result of that letter of Mr. Chichester Fortescue's was a recommendation of an alteration in the system by the Board of Education, and the preparation of an Estimate for carrying it out. But a change of Government took place, the Conservative Party came into power, and the new Chief Secretary, Lord Mayo, declined to do anything in the matter without first having a preliminary inquiry. In the following year, 1867, he announced the intention of the Government to appoint a Royal Commission, which was accordingly appointed in 1868. That Commission sat for three years, and in the end issued a most exhaustive Report in 1871, in which the subject of training of teachers was most elaborately treated. The Commissioners found the facts to be exactly as Mr. Chichester Fortescue had stated—that the training of teachers was miserably defective, both as to the length of time and the number who took advantage of it; in fact, they found there was no effective system of training at all in Ireland, and they went into consideration of the causes which led to this, and the remedies which ought to be applied. The cause of all this, both as stated by Mr. Chichester Fortescue, and admitted by the Board of Education, and proved before the Royal Commission, was the old cause which had marred all educational efforts in Ireland. It was the old attempt to force on an unwilling people a system of mixed and secular education; and here, as everywhere else, it had broken down. The ordinary primary National schools had not failed, simply because, though in name they were mixed and secular, they were in practice, to all intents and purposes, separate and denominational schools; but the training schools, just like the Queen's Colleges, were the purest types of the mixed system; and, accordingly, as in every other branch of education where that was the case, the failure was conspicuous. As already stated, a central training school was established in Dublin, and other model schools subsequently in different parts of the country. Those were essentially mixed and secular schools, and in the central training school the teacher under a course of training was obliged to reside as well as to attend for instruction. The distinction between these institutions and the ordinary day schools was, therefore, a very marked one. The training schools, just as the Queen's Colleges, were real types of thoroughly secular institutions. The evils of this system could not be expressed in more eloquent words than in the Report of Messrs. Cowen and Stokes, two of Lord Mayo's Royal Commissioners. They say—

"No system, however carefully devised, which ignores the power to be derived in forming the character from unity of religious convictions, can be effectual. In Marlborough Street, at every turn, religious differences are kept before the pupils. It is no happy family which is divided into these sects, continually separating from each other for religious duties, who cannot say even 'Our Father' in common. Those young people are no longer children, fresh and light-hearted. They have learned to feel already the bitterness and difficulty which religious differences create."

And they recommend that the training of teachers should be denominational, even if no other part of the system be altered. Sir Alexander Macdonald, so long the able head of the Board of Education, himself a strong supporter of mixed education, admitted the same thing, and stated—

"If we call out 300 or 400 persons from every part of Ireland, from their own homes and their own pastures, every year for half a-year, to be educated in Dublin, it is a very monstrous thing that we should not provide for their spiritual as well as their secular education ;"

and he went on to say that the system of united training of teachers in Ireland had failed. In 1866, when Mr. Chichester Fortescue brought the subject under the notice of the Board, he not only pointed out the existence and the extent of the evil, but suggested a remedy. He suggested, on behalf of the Government, first, the establishment of model and training schools under local management corresponding, to a certain extent, with the ordinary non-vested primary schools ; and, secondly, the granting of permission to students trained in Dublin in the State model schools to board out. In this recommendation the Royal Commission and the Board of Education concurred. Messrs. Cowen and Stokes again report—

"The importance which we attach to the employment of trained teachers generally in schools, the repugnance displayed towards the system of united training, the difficulty of overcoming the reasons on which this repugnance is founded, and the advantages which may accompany increased facilities for establishing and conducting training schools, convince us that the claims for denominational training should be conceded."

And the Commission itself reported—"That the aid of the Board should be given to training schools under the management of committees, voluntary societies, or religious bodies, under certain conditions."

This recommendation of the Commission, made in 1871, has ever since remained a dead letter. In the following year the attention of Parliament was occupied with more pressing questions, and in the year after the Government of Mr. Gladstone went out of Office and the present Government came into power. It was not long in power when attention was again directed to the subject, and in 1874 the right hon. Baronet the present Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), then Chief Secretary for Ireland, wrote to the Board of Education, on behalf of the Lord Lieutenant, to the following effect :—

"His Grace invites the special attention of the Board to the important subject embraced in Question No. 6 [referring to the training schools]. His Grace understands that in England there are 39 training schools, with 2,894 students, with a grant of £90,000 a-year ; in Scotland 5 training schools, with 704 students, and a grant of £21,500 ; while in Ireland there is only 1 normal training school, with 218 students, and a grant of £7,646, although this deficiency is to some extent supplemented by a system of district model schools. It is further to be borne in mind that whereas two years is generally considered the minimum period of residence in a training school, the Irish teachers, with the exception of those that undergo a special term of training, remain only about five months in the Marlborough Street school. The existing insufficiency of teachers, trained even to this extent, cannot but injuriously affect the present standard of education ; and His Grace observes that in their last Report the Commissioners show that they have 6,284 untrained teachers in the service. His Grace is anxious to bring the recommendations of Mr. Chichester Fortescue and the Royal Commissioners under the notice of the Board, while, at the same time, guarding himself against expressing any opinion upon their respective merits."

This letter was written in November, 1874, and in reply to it, in the following month, the Board of Education met to consider the recommendations made by Mr. Chichester Fortescue and the Royal Commission, when they came to certain resolutions which it was the object of the Motion now before the House to enforce. They decided to approve of certain alterations in the system of training in Marlborough Street, and of allowing grants to non-vested or denominational training Colleges or schools upon certain conditions. The conditions were mainly these — that a training College should include a College for instructing candidates for the office of teacher of the National School, and of a practising National School. No grant to be made unless the secular teaching was open to pupils of all denominations, and that the site of the school should be approved of by the Board; that a certain number of hours should be devoted to secular instruction; that the practising school should be a National School carried on on the same system as any ordinary National School; that grants should be made to the credit of the training College of £100 for every master and £70 for every mistress with a first-class certificate, and £80 and £50 for masters and mistresses with second-class certificates who had been trained continually for two years; and if trained for only one year, half the grant to be given—the grant in no case to exceed 75 per cent of the total expenditure of the college, and the examination of students and programme of examination for admission to be settled by the Board. Those recommendations were made in 1874, at the instance of the late Chief Secretary, and nothing had since been done to carry them into effect. On the other hand, since those recommendations were made, things had been going from bad to worse. When Lord Carlingford wrote the first letter, about 40 per cent of the teachers were trained; when Sir Michael Hicks-Beach wrote in 1874, about 38 per cent; but, according to the last Report of the Commissioners on National Education, there were now in Ireland 10,674 teachers, and of these only 3,394 were trained—that was to say, only about 32 per cent of all the teachers in Ireland were trained. So that, instead of getting better, matters were getting much worse; and if the thing was urgent in 1866 it was still more so now. That, then, was the state of affairs in Ireland; and before saying more upon it he wished to call attention for a few moments to what was done in England and Scotland. In England and Scotland no such system as that forced upon Ireland was in existence. In England district training colleges attached to the different religious denominations were recognized and endowed. Up to the passing of the Education Act of 1871, not only were denominational schools and training colleges recognized, but actually religious teaching itself was inspected and reported upon. Since 1871 this had ceased. The State no longer recognized religious teaching; but it did not place it under a ban. It did not say that where religious teaching was given no grant should be made for secular teaching, and it did not make the teaching of religious truths a disability. Yet that was what was attempted to be done in Ireland. In England there were over 40 training Colleges aided by the State in connection with almost every considerable religious Body over the country—with the Church of England, the Wesleyans, Congregationalists, Roman Catholics, and even the Secularists—for the latter he ventured to call as much a separate and distinct sect as any other. All these Colleges were assisted by the State, and what was the result? It appeared from the last Report of the Committee of the Privy Council that of teachers employed in schools in England and Wales only 25 per cent were untrained, 75 being trained; and that training did not consist in a miserable stay of three or four months in a training school, as 61 per cent of the teachers employed in English schools had undergone two years' training, 10 per cent for more than one year, and only 3 per cent less than a year. Further than that, the proportion of untrained teachers in the schools was yearly diminishing. The training schools in England and Wales had now about 3,000 students in training for the two years' course, and supplied annually 1,500, which was nearly or just about the full number required to supply vacancies; whereas in Ireland, with an annual want of about 700 teachers, the total number trained in 1878, according to the last Report of the Board, was 166. Then, as to Scotland. There, as in England, separate denominational training schools were recognized. In Scotland, of the masters employed in teaching, 53 per cent had been trained for two years, 13 per cent for one year, and 5 per cent for less than a year, and 29 per cent were untrained ; and of mistresses 69 per cent were trained for two years, 9 per cent for one year, 1 per cent for less than a year, and only 21 per cent untrained. There were 1,000 students in training for the two years' course, an annual supply of 500 teachers, or more than the full number supplied for the annual vacancies. The training schools in Scotland were essentially denominational, and religious instruction was given in them. The fact was reported even in the Report of the Government Inspector, and examinations in religious knowledge were held at the end of the course ; and on this point of religious teaching the teachers or committees having charge of the College had the most ample powers to teach what they wished, and how they wished. To these denominational Colleges annual grants were made of £100 for every master trained two years, and £70 for every mistress. And further than that, an arrangement had been made with the Scotch Universities, by which a special course of study and examination at those Universities was provided for a certain number of those students, and the attendance at that course of study, and the passing of those University examinations, entitled the students to have their certificates, and the Colleges from which they came to the payments on their behalf, so that they had there in Scotland purely denominational Colleges receiving direct grants of £50 a-year for each student who passed a certain University examination corresponding as they were told in the Report with that of the degree of B.A. Yet, in the face of that, his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) felt justified in getting up in the House and declaring, in a speech which he had thought worth while to have printed in pamphlet form, that the grant of £20 a-year to denominational Colleges for the results of teaching proficiently in secular subjects in Ireland was "absolutely monstrous." In Ireland no grants were made for training schools beyond those made to the Government institutions, and the result was that 68 per cent of the teachers were untrained, and of those called trained only a very small proportion received more than four months' training. In England and Scotland large grants were made to denominational training schools, with the result that in England only 25 per cent of the masters were untrained, and in Scotland only 29 per cent. The system adopted in Ireland had been condemned by successive Governments, it had been condemned by the Board of Education, it had been condemned by a Royal Commission ; yet nothing was done to alter it, and it remained unchanged, side by side with a totally different system in England and Scotland. It was impossible in these circumstances for Irishmen, and especially for Irish Catholics, not to feel that in this, as in every other branch of the Education question, they were treated exceptionally, wholly on account of their religion. If they were not Irishmen and Catholics it would be impossible for this state of things to continue. Even from the most anti-religious point of view it was monstrously absurd. If, by it young men could be induced to enter into the mixed State training schools, and that Catholic candidates for the office of teacher were to be found there in large numbers, there would be some excuse for the proceeding on the ground of common sense ; but when that was not the case, and when the only result was having the education of the country carried on by untrained teachers, the proceeding was absolutely senseless. But it might be said that the granting of the demands in respect of this training of teachers would be contrary to the whole spirit and principle of education in Ireland. He denied that altogether. The system of primary education in Ireland might be called anything that people liked ; but it was, practically, a denominational system, and the moment the State approved of the non-vested primary schools and gave grants to those schools, that moment the whole principle of mixed education was given up, and after the reality was given up it was idle to fight about the shadow. What he wished to press upon the House by the adoption of his Motion was that the principle of the non-vested system should be extended to the training schools, and that non-vested, and, he would admit, practically denominational schools, just as non-invested primary schools, should be put on the same footing of recognition as similar schools in England and Scotland. This demand was a just one. It was a simple one. It was supported by the highest authorities, by the Government of 1866, by the Board of Education, by the Royal Commission appointed by the Party now in power; and he could not believe that the present Government, who had at such an early period shown an interest in the matter, would refuse to grant it. The money for carrying it out was at hand, or, at least, a portion of it. Nearly £50,000 a-year was at present spent in Ireland on the central training schools of the district model schools, and, in a great part, uselessly spent. Some of those funds, at least, might be usefully diverted in the manner he proposed; and in the confident hope that the Government would do that little act of justice he begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. ERRINGTON, in seconding the Motion, quoted statistics to show the defective nature of the arrangements that had been made for the training of teachers, as referred to in the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don). Estimating the minimum number of the teachers who should be trained for Ireland at 500, he calculated that the cost per annum would amount to £25,000. His hon. Friend asked for an increase in the present Vote of £25,000, and the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) also asked for an increase. Both of those hon. Members wished to improve the condition of the teachers, the one intellectually, and the other physically. Considerable retrenchment might, he thought, be effected in other directions. One branch of those Estimates required very careful consideration. The model schools were, professedly, a portion of that training system; and the reports of the Inspectors pointed out how completely they had failed in that respect. Taking those schools simply on economical grounds, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland could fairly effect a considerable reduction upon them. The objects sought by those schools were to give a model of mixed education, to afford examples for the National Schools, and also to give a preparatory training to young teachers. But they had absolutely failed as training schools, and very few of them were really models of mixed education. The Royal Commissioners showed that a very great proportion of the children educated in those schools, with money voted for the benefit of the poorer classes, were the children of the respectable and richer classes. In 1874, a Department Commission of the Treasury was appointed to inquire into those schools, as there was a proposal to increase the salaries of the masters. The Commissioners said that not more than one-third of the children in those schools were drawn from the working classes. No less a sum than £40,000 a-year was thrown away upon those schools, which had failed in every object for which they were intended. In point of fact, the model schools were intermediate schools. For a long time past the managers of schools in Ireland had been alive to the serious nature of the want of training; and, accordingly, in 1875, the Catholic Bishops started a training College of their own. In 1878-79 there were 45 teachers in that institution. The hon. Member concluded by expressing a hope that the House would accept the proposals of his hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "considering the very large proportion of untrained Teachers in charge of Elementary Schools in Ireland, and the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Primary Education which reported in 1868, it is desirable that steps should be immediately taken by Her Majesty's Government to give effect to the Resolution in regard to Grants to Training Schools adopted by the Board of National Education in Ireland in December 1874,"—(The O'Connor Don),—instead thereof.

MR. COGAN said, that his hon. Friend who had already addressed the House (the O'Connor Don) had entered at such length into this subject that, at that late hour, he should not be justified in taking up much of the time of the House. He should not have intruded into the debate at all, if he had not wished to bear his testimony to the deep interest felt in Ireland with regard to this subject. The House had heard, with feelings of regret, the sad history that had been given to it of the state in which so vast a number of teachers in the National Schools in Ireland now were. It was a melancholy thing for them to have to state now that a system which had been in force for so many years in Ireland should only possess 31 per cent of trained teachers, when the total number of teachers was about 6,000. He believed that in any effort which they might initiate, and which they were prepared to make, the state of the National School teachers in Ireland was the most important matter to be considered, and more particularly their training for the avocations which they had to pursue. Though he was always ready to advocate any scheme for improving their physical well-being, and to increase their salaries, yet the most important matter of all was that this House should see that the persons to whom it had intrusted teaching in Ireland should be qualified for the position in which they were placed. It had been shown to the House that for a long series of years the state of the training for National School teachers in Ireland had been complained of, and that a Royal Commission had sat upon the subject, and that successive Chief Secretaries for Ireland had felt it so important a matter that they had brought it under the notice of the Board. It had also been shown that, so long ago as 1874, the right hon. Gentleman who now filled the Office of Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) wrote to the Board of National Education in Ireland, putting before them two proposals with regard to the training schools. One was the proposal of Mr. Forbes' Committee in 1860, and the other was the proposal of the Royal Commission, headed by Lord Powis, in 1868. The right hon. Gentleman now the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in 1874, brought these proposals before them, with the purpose then pointed out by him, and with the desire that the assistance of the Commissioners of National Education should be given to devise some practical and reasonable scheme to remove the state of things which was an obstacle to giving a high standard of education to the Irish people. He was glad to see the right hon. Gentleman to whom he alluded then in his place, and he trusted that they would have his assistance in carrying out the objects which they had in view. The right hon. Gentleman declared then that it was necessary for carrying out the education of the Irish people that an alteration should be made with regard to the training of the teachers, and he submitted these two proposals, which were, to a great extent, identical in principle, and which would carry out the object of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don). He trusted that this subject had been so long considered that they would have an assurance from the Government that night that the hopes of the Irish people would not be left uncared for. This matter was of very serious importance, for it should be recollected that every year which passed saw a number of the youth of the country pass away from these schools, and the whole of their future lives would be influenced for good or for ill by the education which they had there received. He did not think that anything could be more disastrous to the future well-being of the Irish people than that a system of training, which had been admitted on all hands to be defective, should be continued. They desired that that House should unanimously come to the conclusion that nothing could be more injurious than the existence of these schools which were not fit for their work; and he trusted that they would have an assurance from the Government that they would be ready to carry out the suggestions addressed to the National Board by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland. The National Board, in response to his application, put before him a scheme which had been detailed at length by other hon. Members; and he trusted that they would have some assurance from the Government that they would consider this question, and that they were prepared to deal with it. If they did so, he was sure that they would confer a lasting benefit upon the Irish people.

MR. BRUEN observed, that the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) had stated what he considered to be the evils in this system as it now existed, and what he proposed to do to remedy them. It was a very serious thing if any large number of teachers were not competent; but he (Mr. Bruen) did not think he could quite coincide with his hon. Friend in the remedy he proposed. He proposed, in fact, that the training of teachers should be taken from under the control of the National Board of Education, and should be committed to the care of independent voluntary bodies of persons. At present, the training of teachers was conducted under the control of the National Board, and not under the control of other bodies; and he must say that he gave his preference to the training institutions remaining under the control of the National Board. He did not, however, think that even if the training institutions for teachers were placed under the control, or in the hands of persons other than the National Board, the evils which his hon. Friend had pointed out would be remedied, for he thought the evils which he had noticed proceeded from an entirely different source from that which had been stated. He believed that the cause of there being so few competent teachers in Ireland was that the remuneration was so very small. The remuneration at present given to teachers in Ireland was perfectly inadequate to induce men to spend a certain portion of their lives in preparing to enter the service of the National Board, and afterwards continuing in it. The present training institutions trained a very considerable number of men; but it must not be supposed that the whole number trained ever became teachers. It had been noticed that out of those trained a very large proportion, for instance, of those educated at the training establishment in Marlborough Street never became teachers in National Schools at all; or, even if they did, they left the service very shortly, and got into other occupations. That fact showed where the evil laid, and that it was not in the institutions, or in their management, but in the want of inducement to teachers to remain in the service. Had he been in Order, he should have been inclined to move an Amendment, to the effect that it was expedient that additional inducements should be given to teachers to continue in the service of the Board, and that they should have increased remuneration. He believed if increased remuneration were paid to teachers, they would very soon have a sufficient supply of perfectly competent teachers. No doubt, this question was one of expense, and, of course, it was very difficult to come down to that House and ask for a larger supply of money for educational purposes in Ireland. He did not think that they would be driven to that necessity. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Errington) had told the House of the class of children that were educated in some of the model schools. He thought it would be a reasonable thing if some school fees were imposed upon those persons able to pay them, who sent their children to these schools. By that means, they would obtain sufficient money to increase the salaries of the teachers in Ireland without additional taxation. He did not wish to see these fees imposed upon the poorer classes, who were unable to pay for sending their children to school. There should be some provision that, whenever a person was not, in the opinion of the Board of Guardians, able to pay the school fees, then the school fees, or a portion of them, should be remitted. By that means, they would get such a sum of money as would be sufficient to offer a very material inducement to competent teachers.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that there had been three attacks made upon the system of education in Ireland. One attack was directed against the University system; the second against the education represented by the National Schools; and the third, which was most likely to follow, was for the purpose of doing away with the present system of National Education, and introducing an entirely denominational education. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) had brought before the House a Paper containing the recommendations made to the Government in 1874, through the right hon. Gentleman who was now Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). He (Mr. Macartney) was not surprised that the Government of the period did not act upon the recommendations made by a small majority of the National Board of Education in Dublin. Anyone who went through the Papers would see that opinions were very much divided upon that Board, and that three or four different plans were proposed. Ultimately, by a narrow majority, the recommendations were made which had now been brought to the attention of the House. For five years the hon. Member for Roscommon had thought it right not to take any step in the matter; but he had at length brought it forward. In the first place, it was proposed to establish training Colleges which should be entirely denominational, and that 75 per cent of the yearly expense of these Colleges should be paid by the State. The amount to be paid for these Colleges for the training of masters and mistresses was not to exceed 75 per cent of the total expenditure. The Motion did not say the total expenditure for teaching, but the total expenditure for the establishment of the Colleges. Thus, the State was to be at the expense of maintaining institutions of an entirely denominational nature, and was to pay three-fourths of their maintenance. The hon. Member maintained that in England and Scotland a large sum of money was contributed to denominational education; but he did not tell the House how much of the total expenses of the denominational education so afforded came from private sources, and how much from public revenues. If he had done so, he would have told the House that if 75 per cent was to be given in Ireland a very much smaller proportion was now given in England and Scotland. Another of the proposals made was that the candidates should be recommended for examination by the managers of the Colleges, or else by the patron or manager of the school. Hon. Members were not, perhaps, aware how the patrons and managers of National Schools in Ireland were appointed. In England, generally, the patron of the school was a person who had built it, or endowed it, or who paid a very large proportion of the sum required for its maintenance. In Ireland, the schools generally were of a very modest character, and had cost very little, and most frequently the patron did not contribute a single shilling towards the expenses of the school, and the school manager and patron were not in the same position as in England. The great majority of patrons—not the managers—were persons who paid nothing towards the maintenance of the school; but, notwithstanding that fact, it was proposed that those persons should give the recommendations for the training Colleges. The patrons were generally clergymen, either Roman Catholic, or, perhaps, of the Church of Ireland, or Presbyterian, and were very unlike the patrons in England, who had expended money, or contributed towards the maintenance of the school. The great complaint of the hon. Member for Roscommon was that the persons sent to be trained at the training school in Dublin were not enabled to remain there long enough. It seemed to him that it would be better to propose that they should be kept in Dublin for a much longer period, being maintained there by the same Body that now maintained them. If they compared the schools in Ireland under the control of private persons with the schools under the control of the Commissioners, it would be found that the latter would compare very favourably with them. He believed that anyone investigating the state of the schools in Ireland would find that the schools of which the sole direction was under the Commissioners were infinitely better conducted than those under private management. Experience taught that a transfer of the schools now under the control of the Commissioners to private persons would result in the infliction of a great injury upon education. He wished to refer to one question which his hon. Friend had made a main feature of his proposal. At one time during his hon. Friend's speech, he (Mr. Macartney) had thought he was about to suggest that the money required should be taken from some source such as was proposed in his University scheme—namely, the surplus revenues of the Church of Ireland. He (Mr. Macartney) thought that as he had proposed that source for University Education, he would propose that the money for the National Schools in Ireland should be derived from the same source. But he had not made that proposal, and had suggested instead that the expenditure on the National Model Schools of Ireland should be reduced. In his (Mr. Macartney's) opinion, these schools were of the greatest benefit to Ireland, and were the best feature of Irish education below the University. The Returns showed the efficiency of these schools in a very remarkable degree. They were largely attended; and he might mention that among a total of 29 schools about 500 pupils were educated in each school. The average attendance at the schools showed that they were by no means inefficient. He was confident that no better schools where classics were not taught existed. These schools were excepted from the operation of the Intermediate Education scheme, why he did not know. He was one that wanted them admitted; but they were not admitted to the benefits of the Act. The schools might be at a disadvantage as compared with others for one reason, and that was, they were not approved by the highest ecclesiastical authorities in Ireland. The ecclesiastics objected to the attendance at the schools of all who professed the Roman Catholic faith; but, notwithstanding the objection to them, the attendance at the schools was very good. What the hon. Member's proposition amounted to was, therefore, that, with a view to improving the education of Ireland, all the best schools should be swept away, and schools should be substituted which would be under the control and administration of the clergy. All other countries in Europe had, at the present moment, come to the conclusion that education should not be under the control of the clergy, and it was asked that Great Britain and Ireland should go upon a different principle to that which was now adopted in all countries which professed the Roman Catholic religion. He hoped and believed that this country would not be behind the French, German, and other nations, and that they would not, at this the closing part of the 19th century, take such a retrograde step as to establish denominational schools under the exclusive control of the Church of Rome.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. J. LOWTHER thought that the speech of the hon. Member who had introduced this Motion (the O'Connor Don), had been delivered to a House which was somewhat fatigued by the more animated discussion which had occupied the earlier part of the evening. Of course, it was more than could be expected from human nature to be proof against the serious attack which had been made upon their time during the last few nights. He was not surprised, therefore, at the Benches being empty, even when that interesting subject which the hon. Member brought forward was being discussed, and Gentlemen representing Irish constituencies, who they knew took great interest in this subject, were unfortunately prevented, from the causes to which he had referred, from being present in any number. He had been led to make these remarks from seeing that scarcely half-a-dozen Irish Members collectively were present at any time during the speech of the hon. Member for Roscommon, and those who followed in the discussion did not succeed in obtaining a better audience. The subject which had been introduced by the hon. Member for Roscommon had failed on that occasion to arouse any very great interest on the part of Representatives from Ireland; but it was, undoubtedly, a subject of very great importance. Perhaps its importance was insignificant compare with the question of Order or disorder, or with attempts to alter or vary the Forms of Procedure of the House; but, although a subject of less moment, it was one which, undoubtedly, commanded considerable attention. It was a remarkable fact that there were a vast number of untrained teachers employed in the schools of Ireland. That was a deficiency that called for very serious attention. The hon. Member, in enunciating that proposition, was upon very safe ground; it was not likely that he would find anyone to rise in his place and confute that statement. It was true, he proceeded to suggest the remedy for this state of affairs. There had been two remedies suggested with the view of meeting the difficulty, and yet of avoiding the alternative of an increased school grant. The hon. Member for Roscommon and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Longford (Mr. Errington) appeared to go into the matter very fairly upon the question of expense, and it might very properly be considered that that was an important element in dealing with the subject. The hon. Member for Longford suggested, as he thought he was bound to do, some item for retrenchment which would justify the House, in what were popularly called bad times, in incurring any additional expense. The subject which the hon. Member had suggested for retrenchment was that of model schools. If the House had been in a more complete state than it was when the remarks were addressed to it, some other hon. Members might have competed in making suggestions with the hon. Member. He thought the hon. Member would have found also that many hon. Gentlemen would have risen in their places and expressed themselves strongly in favour of the model schools. He did not feel called upon to discuss to what extent model schools really carried out the specific work for which they were intended, nor how far many persons had taken advantage of public funds for obtaining an education to which they ought to contribute. It was not necessary for him to say more upon those subjects, but only to point out that the model schools were doing their work well, and that the subject should be well considered before they were abolished. With respect to National School teachers, their position had for some time engaged the attention of the Government; and he hoped, before many days were over, to be in a position to submit to the House a scheme, which he hoped would meet with its approval, for improving their position in life. That, of course, could not be done without some addition to public burdens, and without financial arrangements into which it was not then proper for him to enter. As they were aware, Parliament had then arrived at a very late period of the Session, when the time of the House was counted by moments, and it was impossible at that time to deal with any fresh subject. They must be all aware, from sources of information open to everyone, that there was a measure then engaging the attention of Parliament in "another place," which they might hope soon to have brought before them. He said this to show that the time of Parliament during the remainder of the Session would be fully occupied, and more than usually occupied, with the subject of education in Ireland. Therefore, he thought the House could scarcely be unprepared for his statement on the present occasion, which was that the Government was not prepared at the present time to enter upon this very important and by no means small field which the hon. Gentleman had opened out that night. He might, however, state that it was a subject which had been engaging the attention of the Government for some time; and if he could see his way at once, without raising any difference of opinion on the other side, to settle this question, he could assure the House that he should be glad to do so. Anyone must, however, see that if there were any proposal made it would be met with difference of opinion on one side; and where it was likely that a subject would meet with opposition from one Party or another at that period of the Session, the Government would not be justified in taking up the time of the House by bringing it on. At the same time, he could assure the House that the subject was one which would not be lost sight of by the Government; it would involve considerable financial arrangements when they came to approach it. The hon. Gentleman, by the discussion he had raised that night, had done good service; he had stated his views with great ability and clearness. He had succeeded also, in the interests of the public service, in illustrating the fact that this subject was not to be approached without great consideration, and that it would occupy more time than the Government felt at that moment was at their disposal.

MAJOR NOLAN remarked, that hon. Members must be very glad to hear that the Government were going to do something for the National School teachers of Ireland. That was the only bright spot in the otherwise gloomy speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. If the Government were going to introduce a scheme for the benefit of National School teachers, a great advance would be achieved in primary education; and he did not think that so long as they were going to do something the Government was open to very much censure. The points brought forward by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) were very important. In telling the House only that the Government were going to do something for the National School teachers, and in not going into any of these matters, he thought the Chief Secretary for Ireland had been playing with the House. The Chief Secretary had said nothing of any sort or kind about the Motion, except that something was to be done for the school teachers, and that the subject would be considered. Amongst the very vague promises offered them, there was, as he had remarked, the only bright spot, that something was to be done for the teachers. The present Government had been in Office six years, and he thought it time they did something for Ireland, as it was now said they were going to do. He would remind them that this was the last Session that they could be put off with mere promises, and that the time had come when these matters must receive attention.

COLONEL COLTHURST wished to say one word with respect to the cost of training school teachers. Every pupil trained in the school college at Dublin cost £50 a-year. The English system gave a great deal more freedom, and cost £60 a-year per teacher. But there was this difference with regard to the result of the English system—no one was paid in England until two years' training had been completed, and, more than that, until two years had been passed in teaching, and the teacher had been reported upon favorably. At the College in Marlborough Street, a teacher received £50 a-year during the first two years of his career, whether he afterwards became a teacher or not. The cost of the English system, which had so many advantages was, therefore, only one-fifth more than the cost of the Irish system. Some remarks had been made with regard to the managers and patrons of National Schools in Ireland having expended very little money, and, therefore, not being deserving of much consideration; but hon. Gentlemen forgot that the reason for this was, when the National system was introduced into Ireland the landowners set their faces against it, and not only would not contribute, but would not dispose of their land for the schools. In consequence of that, the Catholic clergy were obliged to collect money from their poor parishioners in order to provide schools; and in too many cases these schools were, from the nature of things, miserable edifices. That was one of the reasons why National Schools in Ireland were in so unsatisfactory a state.

THE O'CONOR DON believed he had no right to reply; but just wished to say, in consequence of the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that as he did not perceive, in the answer he had made, any sort of promise that his desire would be carried out, he could not but express his feelings in a Division. He thought the measure should be pressed, especially as it had been before Parliament ever since the year 1874.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 64, Noes 48: Majority 16.—(Div. List, No. 161.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock till Monday next.

BRENTFORD AND ISLEWORTH TRAMWAYS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d."

LORD TRURO moved the rejection of the Bill on the ground that the population of the district was insufficient to support the line, and that there was no traffic of sufficient extent to make it remunerative. The line was only the middle part of a projected line, the two extremities of which had been rejected. It was, moreover, of such a length—one mile and a few chains—as to render it unavailable for any useful purpose, and the road on which it was to be constructed was only 24 feet in the broadest part, and 17 feet in the narrowest. Therefore, a tramway on such a road would be an obstruction and inconvenience.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) asked how it was that the parties who objected to the Bill had not appeared to oppose it before the Select Committee?

LORD TRURO said, the parties who objected to its construction had no locus standi, and, therefore, had been unable to appear against it. He moved that the Bill be read a third time that day three months.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) thought that after the statement of the noble Lord further consideration of the measure was desirable.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

SLAVE TRADE—SOUTH EAST COAST OF AFRICA.—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there was a matter of great interest with regard to which the public would be glad to have some more information than they possessed at present. He referred to the Treaty with the Sultan of Zanzibar for the suppression of the Slave Trade in that part of the African coast over which his influence extended. It was known that though the Sultan had at first refused some pressure to induce him to agree to the Treaty, yet that since his agreement to the Treaty he had not only fulfilled its conditions to the letter, but he had gone beyond them. If the Government could give some decided information on the point, it would give satisfaction to the country.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : There can be no doubt that the persuasion which has been brought to bear upon the Sultan of Zanzibar in this matter is one of the most successful operations on record. The Sultan's conversion to the noble Lord's views has been complete. The Sultan signed a Treaty, and since that he has given a most hearty and cordial co-operation in the suppression of the Slave Trade in those regions. We have acknowledged this conduct on the part of the Sultan on several occasions, and recently by presenting him with a considerable number of Enfield rifles—the substantial form in which we have recognized his thorough good faith. But I merely refer to this as showing that we are not insensible to the valuable assistance we have received from the Sultan, and let me add that if slavery is ever to be completely suppressed there, it will, no doubt, be owing mainly to his co-operation.

TREATY OF BERLIN—EVACUATION OF THE PROVINCES.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD CAMPBELL, in rising to call attention to the Correspondence on the affairs of Turkey and the present position of matters with reference to the Russian evacuation of the territory on this side of the Pruth, and to move an Address to Her Majesty on the subject, said: My Lords, I know how hard it is to draw attention to the subject of this Notice when the mind of Parliament is agitated by another set of circumstances. At present, except upon South Africa, the grief it has occasioned, the vicissitudes it offers, nearly everyone is doomed to find unwilling ears, or make unwelcome observations. I will, therefore, pass at once to a few details, which may be easily recalled, and which, at least, show that the topic now before us is appropriate and necessary to the moment. It is now the 14th of July. On the 3rd of August, the whole of the foreign territory occupied by Russian Armies ought to be evacuated. Nothing has been said of late as to their movements. The journals are nearly silent with regard to them. According to a paragraph which has reached me from Constantinople, so late as the 25th of June two regiments were still in East Roumelia. Whether the great body are there, or in Bulgaria, or concentrated between the Danube and the Pruth, if known at all, is only known to the Government. My Lords, we should remember, here, the evacuation had two stages, according to the 22nd Article in the Treaty of Berlin. The first stage was not completed at the period assigned for it. I cannot venture to repeat what has been said before in this House upon the subject, or go back to a controversy with which, perhaps, your Lordships are fatigued; but the more it is examined the clearer it becomes that, at the end of nine months, East Roumelia and Bulgaria ought both to have been quitted. Such, I am convinced, was the original impression of the Government, as it appeared to be the language of their Representatives and organs. A deficiency having occurred upon the first stage, not only suggests a deficiency upon the second, not only offers a temptation to it, not only raises a specious argument in favour of it—which it would be imprudent to exhibit—but really makes it harder to avoid it. If Russian troops had not remained beyond the legal time within the territory of the Sultan, the three months allotted as a margin would have more easily sufficed to march across Roumania, as the Treaty contemplated, or, if that method was preferred, to gain

Odessa from a port of embarkation. On the whole, then, there is little reason to anticipate the final exit on the 3rd of August, without new efforts to obtain it. The Address which I submit, although no censure is involved in it, would be an effort of this kind. It would unavoidably sustain the efforts which the Government are making, or hasten those they are preparing. Had something of the kind been done in the middle of April, we should probably have now been in a different situation. But it would then have had the aspect of gratuitous, and thus of hostile, admonition. It is now dictated by experience of something which has happened, and of something we regret. My Lords, although I have not spoken very long, the whole case is now, in some degree, before your Lordships. Everyone can see that the observance of the Treaty on the 3rd of August, after the damage it incurred on the 3rd of May, is, primâ facie, improbable. But doubt may possibly arise as to the importance of delivering the territory, whether it is termed Roumania, or Moldavia and Wallachia, at the stipulated period. Men may ask whether it is worth while to be tenacious, however justly, on the point, after the great events and hazards they appear to have surmounted? The answer is—that the War of 1854 was brought about by nothing but the occupation of the Danubian Principalities. When that occupation ceased peace might have been negotiated, although a separate attempt, a new departure, was resolved on. The alliance of France, Sardinia, and Great Britain, the Expedition which left our shores, the resolution to embark on war after an interval of 40 years—these new and mighty elements of policy—had, as their immediate aim, to clear from Russian Armies the Danubian Principalities; although, according to the Czar, those Armies were not directed against the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, any more than the existing ones profess to be. Indeed, it is remarkable that on the day when Russia passed into Moldavia in 1853, as Mr. Kinglake, the historian, has mentioned it, the four Powers, then acting together, sent out their protest to discountenance the movement. We have, therefore, their authority, with that of Lord Clarendon, Count Cavour, and Napoleon III.—who cannot be forgotten in this country—for maintaining that the occupation of the Danubian Principalities—whatever object is assigned to it, whatever mask it may assume—is not a state of things which Europe can assent to. If it was dangerous in 1853, it is now far more so. At that time, the line of the Danube was protected by considerable Armies, with so great a Commander as Omar Pasha to direct them. Beyond, there was a quadrilateral of fortresses, of which Silistria made itself immortal. An Army of the present Czar, in the Danubian Principalities, has nothing to intercept a march upon Sophia, unless it is a new Bulgarian Militia, which his policy has organized. Diplomats and strategists would equally admit that the occupation of the region can less than ever be regarded with indifference. Indeed, we should remember that if it lasts a day beyond the 3rd of August a European war is justified. What justifies a war is not certain to produce a war; but it involves a fatal bar to the tranquillity so requisite to every branch of industry and commerce at this moment. My Lords, it is now worth while to reflect upon the many interests, the many recollections, which tend to a delay of the withdrawal, unless your Lordships counteract them. One ground of the reluctance to be reckoned on is connected with the position of Austria in Herzegovina and Bosnia. I leave the House to reason on the subject. To pass on, influence at Bucharest has long been assiduously cultivated at St. Petersburg. To sway the counsels of Tirnova or Sophia is a newer and, perhaps, a keener aspiration. To govern indirectly at Constantinople was an aim of Russia long before, and cannot be renounced when she has nearly been established in that capital. These objects all suggest to her delay in the withdrawal. It is encouraged by the many triumphs over the rest of Europe her Government has recently obtained, whether in luring towards her Continental States which had formerly opposed her; or in suspending wholly the resistance of this country to her efforts; or in finding zealous partizans among the authors of the War in the Crimea; or in proving the futility of Treaties to restrain her from encroachment; or in gaining at Berlin, twice over, nearly all that she was seeking; or in reducing the balance of power to a collapse unparalleled in history. Another strong consideration for the delay of the withdrawal arises from what is going on in South Africa. We have there, apparently, a Force as large as went out in 1854, however different may be the objects in their magnitude. We have there the military leader whom the public is most inclined to depend on. We have there the passions and the energies which any other struggle would require; and there we seem to be exhausting all the spirit of the country. Last of all, delay of the withdrawal is encouraged by the inevitable lassitude the Eastern Question has occasioned in the Legislature, after attention has been so long, exclusively, and painfully devoted to it. If any other proof is wanted of the Russian disposition, the Treaty of San Stefano reveals it. The Treaty of San Stefano includes an occupation of a year beyond the length eventually conceded in the Treaty of Berlin. But the Correspondence of this Session—which the Notice has adverted to—is one continued illustration of the tendency to enlarge the Treaty of Berlin into the Treaty of San Stefano. If thus, my Lords, the risk we have to deal with is established, an Address of the kind which I submit must prove at once that a large class in the United Kingdom—and not an unenlightened one—regard the matter with solicitude. Indeed, the very language of the noble Earl the First Lord of the Treasury, when he came back from Berlin, would be sufficient to defend it. At that time, the noble Earl, according to the ordinary channels, stated as the great political conclusion to which he had been led by so remarkable a Congress was that the language of Great Britain ought to be more distinct as regards the line of action she desires to promote upon the Continent. No doubt, the lesson has had many illustrations. Had her language been more distinct in 1853, it is notorious that the costly struggle which ensued might have been easily avoided. Had her language been more distinct in 1873, the three Powers would have paused before advancing in their scheme against the independence of the Ottoman Empire. In 1877, the lesson was repeated. Had the language been more distinct some months ago, Russian troops might not have lingered after the 3rd of May in East Roumelia and Bulgaria. Unless it is now distinct, you have not any reason to assume that an occupation will be terminated as you wish, when there are keen and nearly irresistible temptations to prolong it. But, still, it may be asked whether this House ought to declare itself? My Lords, during five years the Eastern Question has perpetually occupied it. Numerous debates have taken place, and they have been initiated in a great diversity of quarters. Some noble Lords have come forward as the special patrons of the races subject to the Porte, some as the converted and little-qualified adherents of St. Petersburg, some as the avowed supporters of what was done in 1856, so far as it was possible to guard it. But at no time in a drama so eventful has the House been permitted to exercise the influence over arrangements without which discussion seems to be a mere parade of knowledge and of argument. So far as my memory recalls it, in the whole transaction which has occupied us in so many of its phases, nothing has been brought about as yet, or been averted by your Lordships. Neither as regards the vassal Principalities, the Herzegovinian insurrection, the more momentous conflict which ensued, the settlement which followed it, has the voice of this House been fruitful or effective. At length, it may exert itself in such a way as to promote the deliverance of all the European Powers from a considerable peril. Had the Government succeeded in effecting the first departure at the proper time, there would be, of course, no ground of interference from your Lordships. As they did not succeed—however little we reproach them for it—such interference is legitimate. It is the conclusion of experience; it is the step of prudence; there is not any title to resent it. It would be a fitting close to the long, the agitating, but hitherto the unproductive toil your Lordships have devoted to the subject. It may be asked, perhaps, still more particularly in what manner the Address would tell on Russian counsels, should it be the pleasure of your Lordships to adopt it? Looking to what is known of the interior, and what our meditation would suggest to us, there are probably two parties at St. Petersburg—one desirous to close, the other to extend the occupation. One would dwell on the recent discontent, not less alarming because deprived of any regular expression, the commotion which has taken place, and the transition which appears to be preparing, as a reason for bringing home the Forces of the Empire. The other may refer, with greater accuracy than I have done to-night, to all the grounds of distant policy which are calculated to prolong the tenure we object to. Except upon particular occasions, divided judgment seems to be the chronic state of Governments and Empires. The action of the House would clearly strengthen the Party who support the execution of the Treaty. It would throw weight into the scale, which at this moment may only want a little to establish the preponderance we aim at. By this view, also, an answer may be given to the only possible objection—namely, a reluctance to evince distrust in the governing authority of Russia. Reluctance to evince distrust when long experience creates it, is not the most intelligible part of statesmanship and wisdom. But let this be forgotten. Let it be granted that on special grounds the governing authority of Russia is entitled to the deep consideration of the Legislature. But if the Sovereign of Russia is forced to oscillate between two sets of contradictory advisers, to uphold the more enlightened set is thoroughly in accord with the imagined obligation. It is a boon, because it tends to shorten painful indecision. It is a boon, because it tends to bring about the choice of safety and of honour. It is a favourite topic in some quarters that for many errors into which Russian policy is drawn the ruling power is not to be considered as accountable. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Marquess of Salisbury) not long ago explained that much of what we are accustomed to protest against arises in that country, because no Department is acquainted with the conduct of another. It has been often pointed out that military leaders distinctly arrogate a power independent of the Government they theoretically act under. Distrust of Russian policy is not, therefore, distrust of the legitimate authority, but of something undefined—of something dark, of something surreptitious, which that authority is not sufficient to contend with and to master. But if, upon the other hand, men do hold the governing authority responsible for all that has been done from the Crimean War down to this moment, they certainly are not required to withhold any step which is calculated to enforce the Treaty of Berlin and to release the territory occupied, because it may not be acceptable at St. Petersburg. The noble Marquess may point out that movements have taken place which insure the retreat by the 3rd of August, although they have been studiously concealed from us. He will not probably recur to the position that Treaties are mechanically sure to execute themselves; that their spontaneous force in the discharge of obligations may be thoroughly relied on; that they do not want the slightest vigilance to guard them. Prepared to listen to anything by which it may be shown that such a course is not essential to its object, I move the Address of which I have given Notice.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty to exercise her diplomatic influence in the manner best calculated to secure the complete evacuation by Russian troops of all territory on this side of the Pruth, whether belonging to the Sublime Porte or to Roumania, at the time stipulated in the Treaty of Berlin.—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I trust I shall be able to give a satisfactory answer to the noble Lord; but I am not quite certain of the subject, for I am not absolutely sure what the points of the noble Lord's observations were. He was exceedingly discursive, wandering over a wide extent of territory. The number of troops we have in South Africa, the operations of Omar Pasha in 1853, the Crimean campaign, the state of Russian politics, the division of parties in that country, and the proceedings which took place at Berlin—all successively had the honour of his attention. I am not quite certain whether I have accurately summarized the points which the noble Lord wished to bring before the House. But as I understand it, it was this—that the Russians had been guilty, as he expressed it, of inefficiency in the evacuation of the territories referred to, and that in consequence we could not trust them for the future; and he fears that they will not fulfil the Article of the Treaty of Berlin which binds them to evacuate all the territory West of the Pruth by the 3rd of August. As I understand, the noble Lord's solicitude is engaged mainly upon the position of Roumania, and the probability that if Russian Forces continue to occupy that Province there will be danger that this country would be involved in war. I do not think there is much danger of any continuous occupation of Roumania; because, by the information I have received within the past two or three days from Mr. Comberbach, the acting Representative of Her Majesty in that Principality, I learn that there is no Russian soldier within the confines of Roumania at this moment. With regard to the fulfilment of that Article of the Treaty of Berlin which binds Russia to have none of her soldiers West of the Pruth by the 3rd of August, of course, I have not the gift of prophecy, but I can only say I have received the most positive and distinct assurances from the Russian Government, and when I saw Count Schouvaloff the other day he repeated these assurances in the most distinct manner. All the information I have received from Her Majesty's Representatives in these countries, though I am unable to say what is the exact number of Russian troops West of the Pruth, leads to the belief that they are comparatively few, and that they are rapidly moving to the ports from which they are to embark. I understand that Philippopolis was yesterday to have been entirely denuded of all the Russian troops there, and that they are moving upon Varna and Bourgas, where they are to embark. All the indications which have reached me lead me to believe that by the stipulated time the Russian troops will have left all the territory West of the Pruth, and I have received no indication pointing in an opposite direction. That is the only answer I can give. The noble Lord appears to attach more force to these Motions than they really possess. He is pursued by remorse because he did not, in April last, bring forward a Motion of this kind, in which case he thinks the period of the evacuation would have been materially altered. I think it my duty to convey some consolation to the discontented mind of the noble Lord.

LORD CAMPBELL said he had never made such a statement.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: If he had made the Motion, the noble Lord believes the course of things would have been materially altered. However, I can assure him that if he had made any number of Motions things would have been not in the least different, and I do not believe this Motion will have much effect in influencing the movement of the Russian troops or asserting the policy of the Government. I think any Motion indicating an unnecessary tremor upon the part of the House had better not be put from the Woolsack, and, for my part, if it is put I shall say "Not-content."

LORD HOUGHTON said, he had heard with great satisfaction from those who could speak with authority that the hostile population of Roumania were settling down into a state of tranquillity, and consequent prosperity, to a degree almost beyond what could have been expected by the most sanguine among us.

LORD CAMPBELL, in reply, said, that no importance ought to be attached to the contemptuous manner in which the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was equally disposed to treat his friends and his opponents. The noble Marquess had at first attributed to him (Lord Campbell) remorse; but, in point of fact, the self-reproach which the noble Marquess had incurred for too easy acquiescence in the first departure from the 22nd Article could alone explain the uncalled-for acrimony he had introduced into the discussion. The confidence of the noble Marquess in the opinion that the Russian Army would pass over the Pruth by the 3rd of August did not seem to be greatly backed by the admission that it had not yet entered the territory of Roumania. But no one was so much interested in the final execution of the Article as the noble Marquess. While he declared himself convinced that the Address proposed would not conduce to that result, the House would naturally be unwilling to adopt it. If the retreat by the 3rd of August took place, the debate would have promoted it; if it did not, the responsibility of the Government would be much enhanced by the proceedings of that evening.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

BILL—(No. 134.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Order of the Day for receiving the Report of the Amendments, read.

Moved, "That the said Report be now received."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD EMLY: My Lords, it is, I think, unfortunate that this Bill, in its various stages, has not been put down as the first Order of the Business of the Day, and that, consequently, very little time has been allowed to your Lordships to discuss the measure thoroughly. I am not so presumptuous as to imagine that any suggestions of mine could have any weight with Her Majesty's Government; but still, as a witness, I may, perhaps, claim some authority as to what the grievance is under which those who conscientiously reject to reside in Trinity College or the Queen's Colleges suffer, and as to how far this Bill, if passed into law, will remove that grievance. As I wish to detain your Lordships for as short a time as possible, I will confine my observations, as far as I can, to the statement made by the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack on Tuesday last. The noble and learned Earl claimed, as a merit for the Bill, that it allowed no affiliation of Colleges; and, secondly, that University Education could not be placed under the same amount of strict control as Intermediate Education can; and that a Conscience Clause could not be applied to it. Consequently, in the opinion of the Government, the principle of the intermediate schools could not be applied to University Education. The first of these propositions shows that the noble and learned Earl fails to comprehend the grievance with which he proposes to deal. The second, that, in his judgment, the only possible means of redressing that great grievance cannot be applied to it. I think I correctly sum up the result of Tuesday's debate, when I say that noble Lords on both sides of the House who took part in it advocated the principle of educational equality in Ireland—in other words, that the same educational opportunities should be open to those who, by conscientious convictions, are prevented from availing themselves of the existing Universities which are enjoyed by their fellow-countrymen. I am not going at any length into the controversy as to whether this Bill would, if it became law, confer any benefit on those for whose relief it purports to be intended. I agree with my noble and learned Friend near me (Lord O'Hagan) that this Bill confers no benefit at all. It is quite true that the fees for non-resident students in Trinity College are 16 guineas a-year; but all the prizes and honours of Trinity College are open to those students; whereas, under this Bill, not a single prize or reward, such as the students of the Queen's Colleges enjoy, is open to students who are to be admitted to the new University. I ask whether this is a step towards educational equality? We are to be united with the Queen's Colleges, and to be as Pariahs—to carry about with us the marks of our inferiority. I believe, further, that the degrees of the London University would be more valued than degrees conferred by this new University; and though the noble and learned Earl says degrees cannot be procured in Ireland, except by the students of Colleges, whereas a Roman Catholic living anywhere may get degrees under the new University, he shows that he has not made even the faintest approach to understand what we want. My Lords, what we ask for is educational equality, and not the mere empty title of a degree. This is open to us now; but that robust formation of character, those ennobling associations, the concentration of each Professor with his own subject, can only be had in a College—unless you give College life and College training you give us nothing. Cardinal Newman, an authority than which none, I am sure, in the opinion of your Lordships, can be higher, somewhere contrasts the so-called University Education, which dispenses with residence and tutorial superintendence, and gives its degrees to any person who passes an examination in a wide range of subjects, with a University which had no Professors or administrators at all, and expresses the opinion that the latter would be more successful than the former in moulding and enlarging the mind. I am sure your Lordships' experience renders any lengthened argument on the subject unnecessary. A friend of mine, a man of great ability, who, though young, has attained one of the highest positions in the country, went up for examination in Trinity College. He had received all the training which could be given to him in the country, and still he got no prize. After this he came to reside in Dublin, and studied under the Professor of Trinity College; and he for three successive years got every honour that was open to him. Turn to the calendar of the London University, and your Lordships will find, out of 18, 15 in the Bachelor of Arts' examinations for mathematics, who got the first places for their respective years, had an education at Oxford and Cambridge. If we look around, the same phenomenon presents itself. I assert, therefore, without fear of contradiction, that unless you give those who are excluded by conscience from Trinity College and the Queen's Colleges the means of having a College of their own, with richly-endowed Professorships, with libraries and museums, you do not place them on a level with their fellow-countrymen who enjoy those advantages. Examinations for those who have not had the opportunity of Collegiate Education are excellent as a supplement to a University system. They are the only ways of providing for minorities. But to offer such a system to the majority of the Irish nation, particularly when the minority have the better way provided for them, seems to me little less than trifling with a great subject. I agree with what the noble Marquess opposite said as to bit-by-bit reform. When the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in the other House, intimated this Bill, I exhorted my Friends to accept it, if it should be found to contain any real concessions. But although it is a good thing to make any step on the road we wish to travel, I object to be led into a bye-path which terminates in a bog, where I am to have my legs and arms powerless, while those with whom I have to contend have full play of their limbs. I come now to the second point in which I take exception to the noble and learned Earl's speech. I adhere to the mode of settling this question I proposed some 13 years ago in the House of Commons. I wish to see the Irish Act of 1793, enabling a new College to be erected in the University of Dublin, so amended as to allow a Catholic College to be established there. I should like to see the students of this College vie with one another for University honours, associating together as the men of Oriel and Christ Church used to associate when I was at Oxford. This scheme seemed once likely to succeed. It was looked on with favour by many of the most distinguished men of Trinity College; but they have yielded to the seductive voice of Mr. Fawcett, and the day for its adoption, I fear, has passed, and I, therefore, have given my entire adhesion to the proposal suggested by the Irish Government, and accepted by the Catholics so entirely, that with honour they could not recede from it. In one word, the plan was to apply the principle of the Intermediate Education Act to University Education. It was intended to give power to the Senate of the University to be created, to limit the number of Colleges to be affiliated, and to allow no result fees to be paid for any but the students of affiliated Colleges. Thus, the teaching power, of which we have not a superabundance in Ireland, would have been concentrated, not scattered. I ask the noble and learned Earl to explain why there should not have been a Conscience Clause imposed on those two, or three, or four Colleges, and why every provision and control in the Intermediate Education Act should not have been applied to this? Would this plan have endowed religious education? Why, the Bill contained a direct prohibition to pay one halfpenny for religious education. Was this prohibition nominal merely, or was it real? Look at the safeguards by which it was surrounded. The Senate was to be lay and mixed, composed both of Catholics and Protestants; the subjects were to be fixed by the Senate; Examiners were to be appointed by the Senate; not a shilling could be paid except on account of passing an examination on subjects fixed before Examiners so appointed. Secular education is the article wanted, and secular education alone would be the article paid for. Are you responsible, my Lords, for the character of the establishment where you buy your clothes? Do you refuse to take your sugar or your tea, because it is produced in a slave-holding country? If the State gets that which it asks for, I submit that it has no responsibility as to the character, religious or otherwise, of the factory where it is prepared. The noble and learned Earl recited my right hon.

Friend's (Mr. Gladstone's) strong denunciation of concurrent endowment. We have also the advantage of having Mr. Gladstone's strongly-expressed opinion that the principle of the scheme I am discussing in no way involves concurrent endowment. Last year, in a discussion on the Intermediate Education Bill, Mr. Gladstone used the following language:—

"I do not feel, therefore, so far as I am concerned, seeing that I have never given direct or indirect support to the endowment of a Roman Catholic University, that I am involved, by assenting to the principle of this Bill, in any inconvenient consequences in assenting to University education in Ireland; while, at the same time, I can conceive that a large part of the practical grievance which I believe to exist in Ireland on the subject of University education in Ireland as it did exist six or eight years ago, when we endeavoured to remove it, may be removed by acting upon the principle of this Bill. Well, then, Sir, the principle seems to be in conformity with that for which we have long contended—that no man, on account of his religious opinions or preferences is, as to education, to be placed in a position of disadvantage as regards secular knowledge, or any of the honours and rewards which may be assigned to a secular knowledge by the wisdom of Parliament."—[3 Hansard, ccxli. 1499-1500.]

We have, therefore, Mr. Gladstone's distinct denial that the principle of this scheme involves the consequences the noble and learned Earl attributes to it. The noble Earl the Prime Minister has received a declaration in favour of this scheme signed by every Catholic of position, professional or otherwise, in Ireland. It has, in its main features, received the support of the Leader of the Opposition. Let me put this question to you, my Lords. If the Presbyterians of Scotland laboured under the crushing grievance of which we complain—if the organs of the Government in Scotland had proposed a scheme for remedying this grievance—if the Leaders of the Opposition had shown themselves favourably disposed to it—if every Presbyterian in Scotland, from the Duke of Argyll to the smallest medical practitioner in the Highlands, had accepted it, and if it had been defeated by the agitation of a knot of Irish Catholics, would Scotland be a country very easy to govern? How can you expect loyalty in Ireland, if you adopt a course towards her which, if adopted there, would extinguish loyalty in Scotland? I am afraid, my Lords, that the course pursued by the Government of raising expectations on this subject, and then dashing them to the ground by this Bill, which is hardly worth the paper on which it is printed, can have but one result. It will kindle again the smouldering embers of Home Rule, and it will revive and excite agitation in a country which, above all things, requires peace.

LORD WAVENEY rose, and had commenced to address the House, when—

EARL GRANVILLE interposing, said: There are a great many noble Lords sitting with me on these Benches who think such an important question as that raised by the noble Lord (Lord Emly) deserves an answer of some kind or other from Her Majesty's Government. The other day I addressed to the Government what appeared to me a not unreasonable question, and I got from them absolutely no answer. My noble Friend, who has every right to speak, especially on a subject of Irish interest, has made a most telling speech on this question, and I am surprised that Her Majesty's Government should think it respectful to your Lordships' House to drop the subject without offering any remarks upon it at all. The noble Lord has given a distinct challenge with regard to a plan formerly proposed by the Government, and since entirely abandoned by them. It tempts me almost to think that there are such persons as Conservative Circassians; but I do trust Her Majesty's Government will consent to give an answer to the statement of my noble Friend.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I must first point out to the noble Earl the grave irregularity of which he has been guilty. I must say that I have never witnessed a greater irregularity in your Lordships' House. The noble Lord (Lord Waveney) behind the noble Earl (Earl Granville) got up, and had commenced his speech when the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition rose in his place, not upon a point of Order, but because he thought fit to regulate the course which the debate should take. All I will say is that it would have been, and it will be, my duty to make some observations on the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Emly) at the proper time; but the noble Lord (Lord Waveney) was in the act of putting a Question, when he was interrupted by the noble Earl.

Lord Emly

EARL GRANVILLE: I was not aware that the noble Lord behind me was going to speak on the general question. I thought he was about to move an Amendment.

LORD WAVENEY was understood to ask whether ladies would be admitted to degrees under the Bill.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: The noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition has, acting under a considerable misapprehension, been induced to take a course which I believe is not very usual in this or any other House of Parliament. The other night, when the noble Earl complains that no answer was given to his observations—referring, I believe, to me personally—he forgets that on that occasion his observations were personally addressed to my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. Again, this evening, the noble Lord who introduced this subject (Lord Emly) particularly addressed his remarks to my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, and called upon him to explain a statement which he had made to the House before, and vindicate some assertions that he had made on the same occasion. It certainly appears strange that the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition should blame the manner and the mode in which we think it wisest to allow the debate of this measure to proceed. I shall leave my noble and learned Friend to answer the questions that have been particularly addressed to him. But I must advert to the extraordinary speech of the noble Lord who introduced the discussion to-night. I can only say that I listened to that speech with amazement. Nothing of the romance in which the noble Lord appeared to be indulging is known to me. We know nothing of this negotiation—nothing of these schemes or plans proposed by us—no proposal was ever authorized by me, either directly or indirectly, on the subject; and I do not know upon what authority he makes the statement which he has made to-night. I must, on my own part, entirely repudiate it—and I feel sure that my Colleagues would equally repudiate any knowledge of it. I think it is only due to the House that the noble Lord should give his authority for making it. If he made it on the strength of confidential communications, he must use his discretion as to the course he may adopt; but, so far as I am concerned, I entirely free him from any awkward feeling he may have on that head. The whole narrative of the noble Lord appears to me, as far as I am individually concerned—and I believe I may speak also with the same clearness and firmness for my Colleagues—one which relates to circumstances of which we are ignorant; and I can only say that, so far as we are concerned, there is not the slightest foundation for the extraordinary statement which, according to his noble Leader in this House, has been a most effective speech. Certainly his statement is one which would very much tend to rouse the passions of your Lordships, and to cause a view of this important and interesting question to be taken for which there is no foundation, and which, to my mind, may occasion much inconvenience in the future discussion of this subject.

LORD EMLY was understood to say that he had not spoken of Her Majesty's Government, but of the Irish Government, and that he had himself seen the proposition to which he had referred. He repeated his statement, that, in his opinion, it was supposed in Ireland that the Government had adopted a Bill founded on that proposition, and it would have been highly dishonourable on the part of the heads of the Roman Catholics in Ireland if they had opposed a measure which they had themselves accepted.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, before I answer the statements in the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Emly), I hope your Lordships will allow me to make an explanation of the statement which I made on a former evening, and which, in some quarters, appears to have been misunderstood—I mean in reference to the Dublin University. In speaking of the Dublin University, I stated it was local in its operation; but I was not speaking in disparagement of the University—I meant, as is the case with the Durham University, that it was local in the sense of being mainly resorted to by the inhabitants of the Northern parts of the country, and I did not intend any opinion unfavourable to the great work in which the Durham University is engaged. I desire also to answer a question put to me by a noble Lord who spoke second this evening (Lord Waverley). I may say that the Bill which we have introduced contemplates, in the preparation of the Charter, words almost identical with the words which are found in the Supplemental Charter of the London University with regard to conferring degrees upon women. We propose that the Senate of this new University shall hold examinations and grant certificates and degrees; and it will, of course, be the duty of the Senate to make rules and regulations for that purpose, which it would be out of place to do in this Bill. The noble Lord who commenced the discussion (Lord Emly) said that the want of those whose interests he represented was not the power of obtaining degrees—that they had already by means of the Universities of Dublin and London—therefore, the noble Lord says this Bill confers nothing. Now, with regard to Dublin University, I have always understood that the argument of those whom the noble Lord represented was, that it was a grievance to be complained of that they should be obliged to obtain a degree from Dublin University. A degree can, no doubt, be obtained without residence from the Dublin University; but in order to do so it is necessary to make an annual payment, which amounts to almost as much as the fees of a moderate College; and two examinations must be passed in the year, which were not general examinations to ascertain general proficiency in literature, but to ascertain proficiency in the particular and specific books which were required in the curriculum of Trinity College, and not in the curriculum of studies of those whom the noble Lord represented. As to the London University, no doubt, it can hold examinations in Ireland; but, in the first place, it is a matter of expense; and, secondly, it is a matter of finding centres at which a sufficient number of students can be collected for examination. Having denied that the difficulty of obtaining degrees was their grievance, the noble Lord went on to say that what those whom he represented wanted was a system of Collegiate training where there might be residence, with the advantage of having Professors who were able to conduct the training of residential Colleges of that kind. Nothing can be clearer than what that meant. I am not passing any opinion whether that is desirable or not—I quite agree with the view of the noble Lord that a College, where there are residence and training in Collegiate life, is as superior to a University which merely examines and confers degrees as one kind of education can be to another. I am for the Collegiate system which prevails at Oxford and Cambridge; and I look upon a University which merely confers degrees without residence and training as a very inferior institution. But what does the demand of the noble Lord really amount to? When he said that they wanted a system of Collegiate training, with residence and a staff of Professors, he means, of course, that they want money in order to provide those things—I will not call it endowment, but they want money. I can only repeat what, as I understand it, is the clear principle upon which Parliament is prepared to proceed—that a system of endowment and denominational Colleges is one which they are not prepared to accept. The lines upon which Parliament has proceeded hitherto, and the one on which it is prepared to proceed for the future, if we may judge from recent debates, as well as from long standing practice, are that demands for aid in favour of separate institutions in the form of endowments for denominational Colleges cannot be acceded to. I will now proceed to consider the mode by which the noble Lord proposes to get rid of this difficulty. He says, why not do what you did last year? Why not proceed upon the lines of the Intermediate Education Act; and he cites Mr. Gladstone as an authority. But, in calling in Mr. Gladstone as an authority for his proposal, let me say the noble Lord should have read a little further in the same speech than the quotation upon which he relies. If he had read a little further, he would have seen where the difficulty lies; because it is very angular that, although Mr. Gladstone's statement is in favour of the Intermediate Education measure so far as it relates to prizes and payments made to the student, he takes the objection that might be said—and, evidently, that ought to be said—that where you make payments, not to the students, but to the institutions which educate, you are running counter to the principle of abstaining from the endowment of denominational institutions. He says,

The Lord Chancellor

"It is worth the while of the Government to consider whether there is any value in the contention that the Bill, in providing for the payment of fees to the managers of schools, would not go far to be regarded as payment to particular institutions."

Then, as to the Conscience Clause, Mr. Gladstone said—

"If you confine your exhibitions and prizes to the young men, asking no question at all except as to their competence, you get rid of the whole difficulty as to the Conscience Clause."

That has no place in this Bill, except in reference to schools where there are managers' fees. I would not refer to this, if it had not been said that Mr. Gladstone was in favour of extending to University Education the whole principle of the Intermediate Education Bill. The distinction is taken by Mr. Gladstone between two kinds of payments—the payment which goes for prizes and exhibitions directly to the student, and the payment which does not go to the student, but to the institution where the student is educated. My first answer, therefore, is, that if the noble Lord asks for payments which are to be made in the shape of prizes and exhibitions to the students, all I have to say is, what I said on a former occasion, that I do not consider this denominational endowment. I consider it to be a payment fairly made for the open advancement of education, without reference to denomination; but if he goes further, and says that what he wants is a subvention to enable residential Colleges to be set up or supported, and to go towards the payment of Professors in such Colleges—then, I say, the matter assumes an entirely different shape, and trenches upon what I understand to be the firm and settled principle of Parliament with reference to concurrent endowment. The noble Lord tells me that I have failed to point out the distinction between the arrangements, especially as regards a Conscience Clause, of the system of Intermediate Education and the provisions of the present Bill. The other night the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition was good enough to refer to what he called my points of distinction between the University Education and the Intermediate Education Act of last year; but in commenting on this the noble Lord omitted the gravest and most overwhelming distinction.

the two cases. I said the other night that the Act of last year was passed without the slightest reference to any particular school or schools in Ireland; that it was an Act intended to confer benefits on every school, north, south, east, and west, which might be able to send out students with a sufficient attainment in Intermediate Education. If any existing schools choose to use the provision of that measure they are entitled to do so; and if any new schools are set up they are privileged to do the same, their claims being the same—that they have pupils sufficiently trained. There is no intention, either avowed or intended, to confer the benefits provided by the Act of last year upon any particular schools, or upon the schools of any one denomination more than upon those of any other. But the case is altogether different with regard to the demands made on behalf of Colleges. There is no disguising the demand made by the noble Lord (Lord Emly) to-night, which is the demand always made—namely, "Here are two or three Colleges in Ireland which are denominational, and which are in want of funds for their support. We cannot ask you to make a grant of money to these Colleges; but we do ask you to make payments indirectly, which, "to use the language of a noble Lord, "will reach these institutions." Now, that is the first and overwhelming difference between the Act of last year and the Bill which the Government have now brought in. There was then not the slightest intention or desire to benefit any particular school. If they were to receive advantage it was to be openly on the same footing as others. But here you meet us with a demand which, if acceded to, would take the form of endowment; and it is asked for to benefit institutions which would be just as distinctly pointed at by the Bill were the demand complied with as if their names were set out one by one. I am asked what I consider the difference between a Conscience Clause applied to a College or University and a primary or intermediate school? There is all the difference in the world. If your University and Colleges were scattered all over the country and in every parish of every county, just as primary and intermediate schools are distributed, there is a strong probability that they would be resorted to by all persons of proper age in their immediate neighbourhood, and the protection of a Conscience Clause would be requisite—in order that no boy should be compelled in attending the school of his neighbourhood for the purpose of secular education should be compelled to take religious education along with which you must have a Conscience Clause. Then the Conscience Clause plays a perfectly intelligent and very useful part. It is useful and necessary, and has a most happy effect upon the diffusion of education through the length and breadth of the land. But what application could it have to a large College set up—say in Dublin—for the denominational education of the Roman Catholic youth of that city? It could have none at all. There is not the slightest chance—I would say it would be a moral impossibility to find anyone entering that College except members of the Roman Catholic faith. The institution would not be intended for anybody else, and it is admitted that there would not be the least probability or likelihood of anybody else entering its walls. Those who do not belong to the Roman Catholic faith prefer to go elsewhere. Therefore, to set up a protection of that kind—to set up a Conscience Clause—in an institution never visited by those whom you are to protect against its influence, is merely to proclaim a mockery. My Lords, I think it is, to say the least, throwing a little dust in our eyes to say that whatever proposal might be made with respect to a Conscience Clause in a residential and teaching University such as we are asked to provide would have any weight or application whatever. These are the answers I have to make to the noble Lord—and I am sorry if they are of a character less favourable to his views than he would have desired.

LORD SELBORNE: Although my noble and learned Friend has told us what is the settled principle of Parliament, and although it may be true that Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons expressed some doubt whether the Bill of last year did not contravene that supposed principle, yet I must remind your Lordships that the House of Commons and this House passed that Bill, and that Mr. Gladstone himself did not oppose it. Therefore, it is proved by that instance, either that Parliament has not established any such principle, or that it is not infringed by payments according to results in aid of schools of denominational education: You say that payments by results, which go directly to the institution and not to the individual student, trench upon the settled principles of Parliament as to denominational endowment. But is not that what has actually been done by the Intermediate Education Act? I distinctly protest, in the name of England, against the proposition. In England it is the settled practice for the State to give aid, through result fees, to denominational schools, both Church and Dissenting and Roman Catholic schools, all over the country. And, therefore, I take the liberty of saying that in whatever sense the principle of the noble and learned Earl may be true—and in some sense it is true—it is not true that the practice of Parliament is consistent with the view, that the encouragement of secular teaching in denominational institutions by State payments according to results, is equivalent to the direct endowment of those denominational institutions. It is a new extension of the principle, and contrary to anything yet laid down as a rule to Government by Parliament, to say that payment by results, which go to the institution, and not to the pupils, is an endowment of denominational education. Now, as to the distinction pointed out by the noble and learned Earl between the operation of the Conscience Clause under the Act of last year, and its operation under a measure aiding these institutions, I do not think much can turn on it. In the first place, as everybody knows, those intermediate schools are, most of them, strictly denominational, and some of them, I am told, are conducted by the Jesuits' Society, and it is not less improbable that any Protestant boy would go to a school of that description, than that he would go to Colleges such as we are now asked to assist. I cannot think there is much in that argument against the O'Connor Don's Bill. With regard to the Conscience Clause, I always supposed it was always adopted in the schools in England which are aided by the State, Roman Catholic schools included, not because it was taken for granted that there would be many persons to avail themselves of it, but because the State made it a condition of State aid that if the parent of any child desired to use a school of a denomination different from his own he should be at liberty to do so without submitting to the specific religious teaching usually given in that school. Now, it may even be possible now and then that, under particular circumstances, some Protestant parents might wish their children to enter Roman Catholic Colleges; but without supposing many of such cases, there are, at any rate, the Roman Catholic schools, aided in accordance with the Bill of last year, in which the Conscience Clause exists as a condition of State aid. The Conscience Clause in the Bill of last year would be neither more or less effective than a similar clause in a University Bill. This is a measure of importance to Ireland, and it is essential you should not press against Ireland principles on the subject of denominational education or conditions upon which State aid is to be granted really differing from those which you apply to England.

Motion agreed to; Amendments reported accordingly; and Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

COMMISSARIAT AND ORDNANCE STORE DEPARTMENTS—RE-ORGANIZATION.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, When it is probable that the long-promised Warrant for the reorganisation of the Commissariat Department will be published; whether, considering the great demands which the war in South Africa is making on the services of that department, he will consider the advisability of setting the officers at rest as to their future prospects as soon as possible; and, when he proposes to deal, in a similar manner, with the claims of the Ordnance Store Department?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL, in reply, said, that the Warrant for the re-organization of the Commissariat Department was now on its way to the Treasury, and he hoped it would be shortly published. The position of the officers of the Ordnance Store Department as regarded pay, promotion, and retirement, would be on all fours with that of the officers of the Commissariat Department. There would be no unnecessary delay in the publication.

INDIAN OATHS ACT—ALLEGED TORTURE.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to an alleged use of torture in a case tried before an assistant magistrate in India, Whether he can now state the result of the further inquiries into the subject which he undertook to make?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I received this morning a communication on the subject from his Grace the Governor of Madras in reply to my letter. His Grace informs me that no question of torture was ever raised in connection with the proceedings of Mr. Cox in April, 1878, and there was, in fact, no torture. What happened was this. By the Indian Oaths Act, oaths may be administered in any form common among, or held binding by persons of, the race or persuasion to which the witness belongs. Among the Tamil race the form of oath held most binding is one taken by the swearer in the act of worship with light in hand.

Burning camphor is frequently used for lights in Temple ceremonies. Mr. Cox, in the course of his inquiry into the malpractices of certain village authorities, found great difficulty in obtaining evidence from inferiors against superiors. In his anxiety to elicit the whole truth he allowed himself to commit certain irregularities. First, he directed the Tahsildar to call up certain persons to Arcunum and to detain them there three days in order to remove them from the pressure of objectionable influence, which he had no legal authority to do. Secondly, he directed the witnesses to be sworn in their most binding manner, intending it to be done under the provisions of the Indian Oaths Act. He omitted, however, to obtain the offer of the persons to submit to the binding form of oath, but required them to take it. This, although there is no report of any objection, was beyond the law. And he also allowed the oath to be taken in an informal manner. The Sessions Judge made severe comments on these irregularities, and sent up the case to the High Court. The High Court made no order, apparently thinking the notice of the Sessions Judge sufficient. The matter was some months afterwards reported to the Government of Madras; and they, notwithstanding the Judge's remarks, recorded an opinion that Mr. Cox's procedure was—

"Most irregular and improper, directly calculated to encourage subordinate officials in a resort to illegal expedients in similar cases," and directed their opinion to be communicated to Mr. Cox. His Grace particularly wishes me to add that throughout seven years' service Mr. Cox has proved himself a good officer and magistrate, no previous overstepping of his authority having occurred, nor any complaint of irregularity of procedure. During a long and harassing course of famine duty he proved himself a good and considerate officer.

ARMY—ARMY SERVICE—REPORT OF COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has yet considered the Report of the Committee which inquired into the question of the service of Officers under twenty years of age and other matters; if he has arrived at any decision on those points; and, whether he has any objection to lay the Report upon the Table?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, he could not state in terms the decision at which the Committee had arrived with respect to this matter. A small Committee had sat, presided over by his hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, and they had drawn up a very able Report. That Report had been put into the form of a Warrant and was now being embodied in a Circular. That was all he could state.

CRIMINAL LAW—POISONING BY ALCOHOL.—QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of a hawker, named Finley, whose death a coroner's jury has found to have resulted from poisoning by alcohol; whether it is a fact that, on the day of his death, a bottle of whiskey was supplied to him at the Royal Hotel tap, Winchester, for the purpose of consumption on the premises, that he drank the whiskey in about the space of twenty minutes, and died within a few hours; and, whether the conduct of those who supplied this man with drink requires any further investigation by the authorities?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Yes, Sir; I am afraid the facts stated in the hon. Baronet's Question are true, and a most disgraceful state of facts it is. I have called the attention of the Mayor of the town to the matter, and I have confidence from his judgment and right-mindedness that the investigation of the case may be safely left in his hands.

SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT—UNITED WESTMINSTER SCHOOL OF ART—SUSPENSION OF MR. GOFFIN.

QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Vice President of the Council on Education, Whether, before taking the Vote for the "Science and Art Department," he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of any further Correspondence between the Science and Art Department and the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the United Westminster School, in continuation of Papers already presented; and, whether he would include the documentary evidence referred to on page 37, Parliamentary Paper, No. 86, consisting of the boys' note-books and notes of their written admissions, and of the notes taken by Captain Abney of the answers of four of the boys?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, there will be no objection to the production of further Correspondence on this subject, and the Correspondence will itself explain the difficulty of producing the notes and documentary evidence alluded to in the way required. As the suspension of Mr. Goffin has in certain quarters excited a great deal of interest, and as the Governing Body of the school of which he is head-master are dissatisfied with that decision, it may be convenient if I were now to state the course which we propose to pursue. The hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), who is the head of the Governing Body, has, within the last few days, put a Notice upon the Paper, asking for a Select Committee to inquire into this case. Facts have, within the last few days, also come to our notice which makes it, in our opinion, very advisable that a searching inquiry should at once be instituted into all the transactions connected with Mr. Goffin's suspension. I shall, therefore, propose to move, as soon as is possible, for a Select Committee to inquire into and report upon the circumstances relating to the charges against Mr. Goffin.

INDIA—DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE AND COMMERCE.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, since this House has affirmed the need of a Department of Agriculture and Commerce in this Country where there is so much private enterprise, the Secretary of State for India will reconsider the propriety of abolishing the Department of Agriculture and Commerce established by the late Lord Mayo in India, where the people are so much less able to help themselves, and of reforming and improving that Department rather than abolish it?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, at present we have hardly received any information on the subject mentioned by the hon. Member. We know that the Government of India has transferred to the Home Department the duties at present discharged in the Department of Revenue, Agriculture, and Commerce. I believe that it is expected, from the diminution of other duties, the Home Department will be fully able to undertake them.

RIVERS CONSERVANCY BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. GARFIT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Rivers Conservancy Bill this Session?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he was sorry to state that the Government thought they would not be able to proceed with the Bill this Session.

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS ACT, 1875—COST OF METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether, as it has been stated that the loss caused to the Metropolitan ratepayers by clearing six sites under "The Artizans and Labourers Dwelling Act, 1875," will be over £550,000, he can inform the House if any estimate has been formed of what will be the entire loss to the Metropolitan ratepayers from carrying out this Act in the Metropolis; whether any representation has been made by the Board to the Home Secretary with a view to such an amendment of the Act of 1875 as will diminish the cost of carrying it into operation; and, if such representation has been made, what was the reply received?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: Sir, it is impossible to say what will be the entire cost to the Metropolitan ratepayers of carrying out the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act, as there are many cases before the Board in respect of which schemes have not yet been prepared nor estimates made. Up to the present time, of 14 schemes approved by Parliament, the loss on the six sites referred to will be £562,061, while that on the remaining eight is estimated at £514,409, assuming that the prices received for land equal, and do not exceed, those already offered. The whole matter is under consideration by a Committee of the Board, who propose to make a representation to the Secretary of State, with a view to an amendment of the Act.

EAST INDIA MUSEUM, SOUTH KENSINGTON.—QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that it is intended to break up and disperse the Museum which was collected by the East India Company and was transferred from the Company to the Crown when the change of Government took place?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, it has been decided by the Secretary of State in Council to remove the collections now in the East India Museum at South Kensington. The distribution of these collections has not yet been determined on, and is the subject of investigation by a Committee in communication with the authorities at the British Museum, South Kensington, and Kew Gardens. The main object which is expected to be gained by this step is the increased utility of the collections to the public. The Economic Section, for instance, could be maintained and perfected with great public advantage in the experienced hands of Sir Joseph Hooker at Kew, where he already has a far better collection of similar objects; while as regards the Zoological, Ethnological, and Art collections, their transfer to departments where they will be more generally seen and appreciated seems better than to retain them in a Museum which, somehow or other, does not attract visitors. I may add that it will have the additional advantage of causing an ultimate saving to the Indian Revenues of £9,000 a-year.

CRIMINAL LAW—CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS AGAINST SOLDIERS.

QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Secretary of State for War, If there is any record kept by the Military authorities, or by any department of the War Office, of the number and result of criminal proceedings instituted against soldiers before the civil tribunals in the United Kingdom?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, there is no such record in any Department of the War Office, as far as I can ascertain.

Sir James M'Garel-Hogg

The only record kept by the military authorities is the entries in the regimental books after each man's name.

DELAYED IRISH RETURNS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the Correspondence between the local authorities, under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, and the authorities of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and with the Chief Secretary, ordered by this House, will be laid upon the Table of the House? Also, when the Return with regard to Admiralty cases in the Belfast and Cork Local Courts, ordered by this House on the 19th ult. will be laid upon the Table?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I hope to lay the Correspondence under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act on the Table before many days. The Return with regard to Admiralty cases has been furnished; but it is not yet in proper form, although I hope in some few days it will be.

MERCANTILE MARINE — WRECK OF THE "STATE OF LOUISIANA" ON THE HUNTER'S ROCK, LARNE.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the danger to navigation caused by the wreck of the ocean-going steamer "State of Louisiana," which has lain at the entrance of Larne Harbour since the 26th December last; and, whether it is proposed to take any steps for the speedy removal of the wreck?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the Commissioners of Irish Lights, who are the responsible authority, have not considered it necessary either to light or to remove the wreck, inasmuch as the Hunter's Rock, on which it lies, is a well-known danger, which is already buoyed and marked by a red sector of light from the Larne Lighthouse, and for the avoidance of which instructions are carefully laid down in the sailing directions. An additional or wreck-buoy has been placed by the Commissioners of Irish Lights, who have stated to me that there is no further danger to navigation than that which has hitherto existed in the rock itself. I am advised that, even before the wreck occurred, it would have been a most hazardous proceeding for a master knowingly to shape a course to go over the rock.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)— SALARIES OF THE STAFF.

QUESTION.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry into effect the recommendations (which have now been before them for twelve months) of Lord Crichton's Committee of Inquiry into the Board of Works in Ireland, as regards the salaries of the staff; and, whether there is any reason for delaying further the decision on that part of the Report which deals with the special cases of hardship in the office establishment directed to be inquired into by Colonel Stanley's letter of the 7th January 1878?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, the Treasury had hoped to be able to deal with the cases referred to before now; but on considering the main questions dealt with by the Committee, it appeared that they involved a consideration of certain of the duties of the Local Government Board, and of the relation of that Department to the Board of Works. It is thought that a better distribution of duties may be made between the two than that which now exists; but it has not been possible during the Session to give sufficient time to the subject to arrange details of the scheme, and it is intended to postpone further action till the autumn. Meanwhile, with such a scheme in contemplation, it is not a favourable moment for re-adjusting the salaries of an establishment which may be seriously affected by it.

TURKEY—CHEFKET PASHA.

QUESTIONS.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Chefket Pasha has been appointed by the Turkish Government to an important command in that portion of Thessaly which lies to the south of the line named in the Thirteenth Protocol of the Congress of Berlin.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Chefket Pasha who has been appointed to an important command in Thessaly is the Chefket Pasha specially mentioned by the Earl of Derby in an official Despatch to Sir Henry Elliot, dated 21st September, 1877 (Turkey, No. 1, 1877, No. 316), ordering him to demand audience of the Sultan, and to require the punishment of the authors of the atrocities in Bulgaria?

MR. BOURKE: I do not suppose anyone can doubt that the Chefket Pasha referred to in the Question of the hon. Member for Chelsea is the same person as is alluded to in the Question of the hon. Member for Frome. In November last Chefket Pasha was transferred from Manister to Larissa in Thessaly, where he is serving, we understand, under the orders of Mushir Pasha. That is all I can say on the subject.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN ADVANCE ON MERV.—QUESTION.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Government have any reliable information as to the military operations of Russia against the Turkomans in the direction of Merv; and, whether any inquiries have been made at St. Petersburg as to the aim and object of those operations?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government believe that operations have been undertaken lately from the Attrek in the direction of that portion of the country which is inhabited by the Tekke Turkomans. With regard to the second part of the Question, the Russian Government have denied formally to Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg, and the Russian Ambassador here has also formally denied to my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that there is any intention to march further towards Merv.

BURIALS ACTS — CHURCHYARDS (ENGLAND).—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the numerous churchyards in England which are full, and therefore unfit for further interment in them; also, that the number of these is constantly increasing, without any adequate remedy to abate this evil being applied by the parishes so circumstanced; whether he will grant a Return, in a tabulated form, of the various parishes in which the above is the case; and, whether the Government intend taking any, and, if so, what steps without delay to compel the parishes, where such a state of things exists, to provide a remedy by the enlargement of the existing churchyards or otherwise?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have no doubt a considerable number of churchyards in England are very full. Some time ago the Government wished to have a very accurate Return; but it was found such a Return would not cost less than £5,000, and we did not think ourselves justified in putting the public to that expense. Certain Returns, however, have been made which there will be no objection to lay on the Table. I have no power when a churchyard is full to order a parish to enlarge it or to close it; but I hope that this question will in future be treated as a sanitary matter, and that something will be done to remedy the inconvenience complained of.

CRIMINAL LAW—IMPRISONMENT FOR STEALING FLOWERS.—QUESTION.

MR. PEASE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the circumstance of two little girls being sent from Camborne Petty Sessions to the county gaol at Bodmin under the following circumstances:—That one girl, named Madden, was about 11 years of age; that the other girl, named Stevens, was only about nine years of age; that they had neither of them ever been convicted before; that they were fatherless and the children of very poor widows; that the crime with which they were charged was that of stealing the flowers, or the plants and flowers, off a grave in the churchyard of Lelant; that they pleaded guilty on the 3rd of June, and were fined 1s. and costs; on the 24th of June, in default of payment, they were sentenced to seven days in Bodmin gaol; that they were actually in gaol six days, having arrived there the day after commitment; and whether he thought little children of such an age should, under such circumstances, be sent to county gaols?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have said, over and over again, that I am altogether opposed to the sending such young persons to gaol. I gave orders long ago that if any such case occurred my attention should be called to it at once. The facts in this case did not come to my knowledge till the term of imprisonment had expired. With regard to the facts stated, I have received a communication from the clerk to the Justices; and it is but just to the magistrates that I should state that, according to that letter, the circumstances of the case are inaccurately put in the Question. I am told that the offenders were not young children of nine and 11, but girls of 14 and 15 years. The offence had been one of frequent occurrence, and it was not only that flowers in graveyards had been plucked, but the plants were torn up and taken away. Such a practice could not be allowed to go on.

CLERKS OF THE CROWN (IRELAND)—REPAYMENT OF ADVANCES.

QUESTION.

MR. MURPHY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, What has been the cause of the delay in the repayment to the several Clerks of the Crown and Peace in Ireland of the amounts which have been disbursed by them to 31st December 1878, in discharge of the expenses of their offices, and for which payments vouchers have been furnished to the Treasury; and, why those officers have been obliged to continue to make advances out of their own moneys to meet expenses necessary to enable the business of their several departments to be carried on?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, the delay has arisen from a difficulty in determining the amount with which the Clerks of the Crown and Peace should be debited in respect of the expense of keeping open an office in the Assize towns of their counties, as they are required to do by the County Officers and Courts Act. But it is hoped that this difficulty will soon be removed, and, in the meantime, in order to save the officers inconvenience, the Treasury has authorized payment to them of proportions varying from two-thirds to three-fourths of the amounts of their claims.

INTEMPERANCE—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. STEVENSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he is prepared to announce the course which the Government intend to take in regard to the recommendations of the Lords Committee on Intemperance, particularly as to the hours of closing on Sundays; or, if the Government intend to embody their views in a Bill to be laid upon the Table of the House before the close of the Session?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, it is not very convenient to take a particular part of the Report of the Lords' Committee on Intemperance, in order to ascertain the views of the Government upon that Report. I have no intention to introduce a Bill at present, and think it will be quite time for me to express the views of the Government when it becomes necessary to introduce a Bill on the subject.

INDIA—KIRWEE PRIZE FUND. QUESTION.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he would explain why the Return, No. 213, of Session 1876, which does not account for all the movable assets of the ex-chiefs of Kirwee, has been presented to the House as a complete Return of all their movable assets; and, why the amount retained, as a right of war or otherwise, by the local Government, has not been entertained therein as the Parliamentary Orders of Session 1873 and Session 1874 expressly require?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I am afraid that I can add very little to a former answer of mine on the same subject. The third and final distribution was ordered to be made on the number of shares admitted to the 31st March, 1876, since which date some few claims have been admitted in addition to that number. Exclusive of these later admissions, the balance against the Treasury on that date was Rupees 15,235 2 6. The Return of 1876 is complete, and—

"Shows the amount of all movable property of enemies or insurgents in the territories of Oude or Kirwee, or of the proceeds thereof, which have passed into the possession of the authorities of India since the outbreak of the war in 1857, distinguishing the funds which have been distributed among the troops and the funds which have been retained or otherwise disposed of by the local Government."

It thus complies in every detail with the Parliamentary Orders of 1873-4. I am informed that the promissory notes to which the noble Lord alludes never passed into the possession of the authorities in India. According to the Report of the Advocate General in 1862, there was no seizure or capture of these notes, and they consequently have never become prize.

AFGHANISTAN—THE CEDED DISTRICTS.—QUESTION.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON asked, Whether the troops had returned within the limits of India proper, and what arrangements had been made for guarding our newly-acquired territory?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I can only give the movements of the troops on the line of the Khyber Pass, and as regards those of particular regiments, I can give no more information than my hon. Friend will find in the newspapers. The garrisons to be maintained for the present on the Khyber line consist of two batteries of Royal Artillery, one regiment of British Infantry, one of Native Cavalry, four of Native Infantry, and one of Sappers and Miners. The remainder of the Force will return to their various stations in India.

EDUCATION (IRELAND) ACT—ASSISTANT TEACHERS.—QUESTION.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the several declarations made in the south and west of Ireland by so many influential and experienced managers of national schools, condemning the contemplated restriction of assistant teachers in the schools under their charge, and stating authoritatively from their knowledge as managers that the recent change made by the Board of National Education requiring a newly increased average of pupils in the schools to entitle them to the benefit of assistant teachers would be seriously detrimental to the efficiency of the teaching staff, and most prejudicial to the interests of education; can he state on whose suggestions such change was thus made by the Board of National Education, and with what objects; and, having regard to the emphatic disapprovals thus manifested, does he intend to make any suggestions; and, if so, to what effect, in reference to this contemplated innovation on the former practice?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I am aware that objections have been made in some quarters to the scheme alluded to. The hon. and learned Gentleman asks on whose suggestion the change was made. I am unable to say what suggestions had most weight with the Commissioners of Education; but among others were some made by myself. As some misapprehension appears to exist upon this subject, I wish to point out how the case stands. In England, one assistant teacher is allowed for every 100 pupils. In Ireland, until a few years since, one assistant was allowed for every 75 pupils, when an alteration was made under which one assistant was allowed for every 60 in the case of males, and for every 50 in the case of females. Under the new rule of the Commissioners one assistant is allowed for every 70 pupils, male or female. Before adopting this alteration they caused a conference to be held of the head inspectors, chiefs of inspection, and secretaries, among whom a very general opinion was expressed to the effect that the proposed plan would not operate in any way injuriously to the interests of education. I certainly look upon it as a decided improvement.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

QUESTION.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, How many "non-effective" men are now in the Royal Irish Constabulary; how many of them have been non-effective for six months or longer; and how many have served for a period enabling them to retire on pension?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, it is rather difficult to answer this Question in the precise form in which it stands on the Paper, because the number of those coming technically within the definition of non-effective is subject to variation from day to day, from the fact of men being on the sick list for a few days and then returning to their duty. It will probably, however, carry out the hon. Member's object if I take three months' absence from the effective strength as the basis of calculation. I find that there are at present 43 men who have been non-effective for a period of three months and less than six months; 17 have been non-effective for periods ranging between six and nine months, which makes a total of 60 in all; 39 of these 60 are men entitled to pension, having served for 15 years or upwards.

TURKEY—AMOOSH AGA.

QUESTIONS.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is aware that the Amoosh Aga, who is Chief of the Police under the Turkish Government in the portion of Epirus proposed to be annexed to Greece by the Berlin Treaty, is the same man of whom the Special Correspondent of the "Times" in Thessaly wrote in that paper of April 4th, 1878, that on February 28th, 1878, he had caused to be "hacked almost to pieces" certain innocent inhabitants of Bulgarini, of whom the "Bodies were then piled up like a row of wood, a row with feet this way, a row with feet that way, and branches, which had been placed underneath them, fired;"

And, whether he will make any representations to the Turkish Government with a view to the removal of Amoosh Aga from a post in which he has power over the lives and fortunes of the Thessalian peasants?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, we have not heard who is commander of police in that part of Thessaly.

MR. H. SAMUELSON: Sir, in reading the Question, I substituted Epirus for Thessaly, which I had written by mistake.

MR. BOURKE: I am sorry I did not hear that the hon. Member made the correction; but it makes no difference to the answer. We have not heard who is commander of the police in either Thessaly or Epirus. In the Papers already laid before the House relating to Thessaly and Epirus, there is a name somewhat similar to that mentioned; but I am not sure whether it is the same individual. We have no means of knowing whether the statement in The Times is correct, or whether the individual therein mentioned is now in command of the police.

MR. H. SAMUELSON: Will the hon. Gentleman ascertain whether he is the same man of whom Mr. Ogle wrote the paragraph, to which paragraph, no doubt, that gentleman owed his death?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I think that must be left to the discretion of Her Majesty's Government. I do not think

I should be doing my duty if I were not to state that these events are alleged to have occurred a year and some months ago. Already all documents relating to them have been communicated to the House, and I do not think there is any reason now for stirring up these matters again unless some report has reached Her Majesty's Government through official channels. The officers employed by the Government in Turkey are perfectly alive to all these dreadful occurrences, and they report upon them from time to time; but I must say that the harm done by raking up these occurrences—

MR. H. SAMUELSON: I rise to a point of Order. I wish to know whether the hon. Gentleman, in answer to a simple Question, whether he would ascertain who a particular individual was, has any right to debate the question whether an inquiry would do harm in Epirus?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member was certainly travelling beyond the limits of a reply. At the same time, I must point out that in regard to a Question of this kind it is expedient that Notice should be given.

MR. H. SAMUELSON gave Notice that he should renew the Question on Thursday.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE—NOTE-TAKING IN THE MEMBERS' SIDE-GALLERY.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. O'DONNELL: I wish, Sir, to make a personal explanation with reference to your calling me to Order on Friday last. I was arguing, Sir, on the general question of the evidence to be supplied to Mr. Speaker with regard to the Business of the House, and I was pointing out the difference between the weighty and valuable evidence that would be supplied by a body of reporters or officials appointed and directed by this House, and that, on the other hand, the evidence supplied by officials or reporters not appointed by this House would be valueless and worthless evidence. At this point, Sir, an hon. Gentleman opposite rose and declared that I had used un-Parliamentary language. I did not notice the point; but you, Sir, immediately replied that I had used un-Parliamentary language, and that the gentlemen in question were gentlemen as well as ourselves. I did not understand the point of your censure either, Sir, until I read it in the newspapers containing the report of the discussions. Then I found that the hon. Gentleman opposite had understood me to use the words "worthless agents," while I used the words "worthless evidence." There may be some similarity between the sounds of the different words; but I wish to explain that I did not use the words imputed to me. My objections were in no way directed towards the individuals you employed, Sir, whose characters I have nothing to say against; and, therefore, I beg to state most respectfully that you were quite mistaken by thinking that I used the words "worthless agents." I spoke entirely of worthless evidence, Sir, and I wish it to be understood that I am not to be judged of being guilty of bringing anything against the character of these gentlemen, whom I must conclude are honourable and respectable men.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—ORDERS OF THE DAY—TUESDAYS AND WEDNESDAYS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have now to move—

"That, for the remainder of the Session, Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motion upon Tuesdays, Government Orders having priority; and that Government Orders have priority on Wednesdays."

As I mentioned the other day, this is the same day of the year upon which a similar Order was made last year, and I need not detain the House by pointing out how very much we have still of Business to get through in the few weeks that remain before the natural termination of the Session. I would say that the first Business we have still before us is the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill. Hon. Gentlemen are perfectly aware of the position in which that Bill stands in relation to the expiry of the Continuance Act which was passed in April; and I would remind the House that unless we are able to get that Bill through the House in the course of this week very great difficulty and inconvenience will arise. I hope it may be possible to conclude the Committee on the Bill, if not to-night, at all events, to-morrow, and that we may be able to take the Report on Thursday. Well, then, Sir, there are the Estimates, which are considerably in arrear. We have a great number of Votes still to take, including some important and pressing Votes, for which our Votes on Account are running out or have run out; and we shall proceed with these as speedily as we can. Amongst the Estimates there will be one which is not already before the House, but for which hon. Members will be prepared—that is, a Vote of Credit in respect of the War in South Africa. These Estimates will, of course, require some time for discussion. Then we have the two India Loans Bills, which will, no doubt, take a day or two for discussion. Then there is the Public Works Loans Bill. There is a good deal of opposition offered, I am aware, to that measure, which is upon the Table; but whether that measure passes in its entirety or not, it is absolutely necessary that a Bill should pass, because, otherwise, we shall have no funds out of which to make advances to local authorities that are expecting them. The advances last year are nearly exhausted, and the time has come to proceed with the matter. I pass over other minor matters which will take some little time; but the House will see that there is a good deal of urgent Business, and I think that the circumstances justify me in making the request which I now make to the House. There are upon the Order Book a considerable number of important measures. Some of these we had hoped at an earlier period of the Session we should be able to pass; but, from various circumstances which I need not now enter into, including, of course, the length of time which one Bill has occupied, it is obviously impossible that we should proceed with all of them. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has already stated that we should not attempt to proceed with the Criminal Code Bill. We are very sorry indeed to lose the opportunity of passing so useful a measure this Session; but we hope it will not be the worse for waiting another year. I am sorry to say that the Patents for Inventions Bill is another Bill that we are not able to proceed with, and we must abandon the County Boards Bill, and the Irish Grand Juries Bill, and, as the House has already been informed by my right hon.

Friend (Mr. Sclater-Booth), we shall not be able to proceed with the Rivers Conservancy Bill. I will not attempt at the present moment to make an exhaustive catalogue of Bills that we hope to proceed with; but there are two Bills that are, I think, of general interest, and which it will be desirable, if possible, that we should pass this Session. One is the Banks Bill. I do not know whether it will pass exactly in its present shape; but I hope it will be found possible to pass, at all events, an important portion of it. The other is a Bill which is of very great interest to the mercantile community and the country at large. I mean the Bankruptcy Bill. We hope it will be found possible to pass that Bill. I am aware that we have both the Bankruptcy and the Valuation Bills. It will be exceedingly difficult to get them both through. I will not say whether it will be possible; but, at the present time, we give precedence to the Bankruptcy Bill, and I hope the House will assist us in passing it. I have said I will not attempt to make an exhaustive catalogue of measures now, but I think, if the House will allow us the days we are now asking for, and if we are assisted in endeavouring fairly to make progress, we may be able to close the Session somewhere about the usual time.

Motion made, and Question proposed

“That, for the remainder of the Session, Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motions upon Tuesdays, Government Orders having priority; and that Government Orders have priority upon Wednesdays.”—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Mr. O'DONNELL said, he had listened with attention to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and the reasons which he had given; and he could not but think that he had given the House no sufficient reasons for granting to him those days of private Members which he requested. The demand for Members' days came, in his opinion, with singularly bad grace from a Government which had occupied so much of the time of the House with Bills commanding no assent from either side of the House, and which had occupied a still larger portion of public time by proposals provoking discussion, and which, after discussion, were either altered altogether or abandoned by the Government. The Government could not ask to be exempt from charges of wasting public time, when it brought in such a Bill as a sham County Boards Bill, which had never a chance of receiving the assent of the House, and which could have been brought in only for the purpose of convincing everybody that Her Majesty's Administration was unwilling, or more probably incapable, of dealing with the problem of county government. Most of the followers of the Government could not utter a word on behalf of the County Boards Bill, which, nevertheless, had occupied a large part of the time of the House. But if he were to go into all the Bills which had been introduced without any apparently serious purpose, he would unjustifiably trench on the time of the House. Not only had the time of the House been uselessly occupied by Government by Bills of the nature of the County Boards Bill, but by discussions provoked by the Government's foreign and colonial policy. How much time had been absolutely wasted by the Government through their inexplicable indecision and their contradictory policy with regard to the administration of Sir Bartle Frere and the strategy of Lord Chelmsford in South Africa? How long had the Government uselessly occupied the time of the House by defending the indefensible proceedings of such officials and generals? How long had they presented an unyielding front, declaring that they would support Sir Bartle Frere and Lord Chelmsford to the end, and then, after days on days of public time had been wasted, they turned round and gave up the very positions which they had defended so obstinately and with such disadvantage to the Public Service? Was such a Government entitled to demand the surrender of private Members' time? Some five or six days at the outside would be annexed by the Government. Had not a far larger number been wasted in the proceedings to which he referred? Again, in consequence of the extraordinary policy of the Government with regard to Irish University Education, the time of private Members had already been uselessly wasted, because they had been induced to abandon two Wednesdays to the discussion of that question, which ought to have been treated by the Government and approached on official authority, and which, after the two Wednesdays had been wasted, had been so treated and so approached. The whole of these two Wednesdays had been absolutely wasted for utterly incomprehensible reasons. Did the Government base their demand for the surrender of private Members' time on that comic University Bill which had already upset the gravity of the hereditary branch of the Legislature, and which was, doubtless, brought on to afford the humorous Members of the Government opportunities to play with the public time. A more worthy way of meeting any demand for increased time would be met, not by taking away the few remaining opportunities of private Members, but by placing the Public Business in the House in the first place, and then the recreation of Gentlemen who went to shoot in the season. He believed he represented a large body of public opinion in the Three Kingdoms, when he said that if the Business of the House was really so much at heart with the Government, they ought to compass it by lengthening the limits of the Session. He did not presume to interfere with the recreation of hon. Members. Whether hon. Members went to the theatre in the evening, or to the moors in the autumn, that was their business; but he protested against the regular sacrifice of the public convenience to the private convenience of a small section of Members. In saying this, he believed he was speaking the opinions not of tens of thousands, or of hundreds of thousands, but of millions. Hon. Members wished to go and shoot, and the least kind wishes they could offer were that they would shoot with more intelligence than they voted. The Government had wasted days of public time in irrelevant discussions on untenable Colonial policy and upon Bills of a sham character; and he hoped that at least a large minority would go into the Lobby against the utterly unjustifiable request which they now made.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER observed, that everyone in the House, and nearly everyone in the country, was dissatisfied with the progress of Public Business in this House. [Ironical cheers.] He was glad he had stated a proposition which had been so universally accepted. Everybody was dissatisfied, and he was himself just as much dissatisfied as any Member of Her Majesty's Government, or anyone outside the House who complained of obstruction. The delay in Public Business had been attributed by different Parties to different causes. One Party attributed it to the conduct of Public Business and to the character of that authority which held the reins of Government, and it had been said confidentially that the reins of Government in this House had broken in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that in consequence Business had not been expedited. It was his (Mr. O'Connor Power's) good fortune the other day to assure Mr. Speaker of his respect for his position and authority, and he was proud to avail himself of this opportunity of assuring the Chancellor of the Exchequer of equal respect for his position and authority; and if no one else would repel the accusation brought against the right hon. Gentleman, he would undertake, however feebly, to do it himself. He denied point-blank that the delay in Public Business was owing to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had had unusual difficulties to contend with. An indefensible policy had been forced upon him by his Colleagues in the Cabinet. He trusted that however long they might be obliged to remain to finish the Business, the Session would not be unusually protracted. He trusted that the remainder of the Business would not be unduly protracted. He thought it was his duty to come down there and urge that the Session should not be unusually prolonged. He had come down to the House prepared to take his leave of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Knowing the Conservative Party to be a grateful Party, he hoped that before the House should meet again after the Prorogation they would reward the services of the right hon. Gentleman by decorating him with a Coronet, and translating him to that Upper Chamber where Obstructives ceased from troubling and where Ministers were at rest. It was said by some critics that the delay in the Business of the House was due to the protracted opposition of certain hon. Members who sat on this side of the House; but he (Mr. O'Connor Power) repudiated that accusation with almost as much earnestness as he did the accusation levelled against the Leader of the House. The delay which was complained of was really to be attributed to our present system of legislation—a system which had been frequently investigated, but for which no adequate remedy had yet been suggested by Her Majesty's Government, or by the numerous Committees which had sat to inquire into the subject. Every year, at this period of the Session, Bills upon which valuable time had been spent, and in connection with which there had been important discussions, were thrown aside; and the House, consequently, had the mortification of seeing that a great deal of its time and labour had been completely fruitless. These circumstances were attributable to the fact that the Paper was each year crowded with a number of Bills for proposed legislation which the House was quite unable to deal with. He suggested, as a remedy, that there should be some division of labour which would enable the Imperial Parliament to devote itself exclusively to Imperial Business, and give local authorities the power to transact local business. The conduct of Business in the House, and the manner in which much of it was shelved year after year, having attracted universal attention, surely the time had come to inquire whether some local machinery could not be set in motion for the transaction of local business, so that the Imperial Parliament might be relieved from the burden of petty concerns. He held that if the English people were not impervious to ridicule, a remedy would long ago have been found for a state of things which left the Government, at the end of every Session, with only one or two paltry or insignificant measures to point to as proofs of the industry of Parliament.

MR. VANS AGNEW said, he proposed to add a few words to the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to accept. The words were as follows:—"Except in the case of Bills which stand for Consideration, as amended, or for Third Reading." Knowing the difficulties that had been in the way of private Members, he was sure the House would not be surprised to hear that only four Bills stood in that position; and the ground on which he would urge the recommendation he had made was that those Bills had been read a second time, their principle had been affirmed, the details had been settled in Committee, and there they remained. But, by the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they would be swept away; and there would be no chance of proceeding further with them. Hon. Members who had had charge of a Private Bill would understand what responsibility they undertook, and they would agree with him, when he said it was hard that when the House had affirmed the principle of a Bill any individual Member could stop it from going on by the application of the Half-past 12 Rule. He thought that Rule should not apply to Bills which had passed through Committee. He had no doubt that the motives of any hon. Member stopping a Bill might be the highest with which man could be actuated. It was also true that he might be actuated by a crochets in which nobody else had any faith; and it seemed very hard, and scarcely respectful to the House, that a Bill of which the principle had been adopted and the clauses adjusted by the House should be stopped by a single hon. Member. If, however, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree to the proposal which he ventured to make, he did not believe that it would detain the House one day after the usual time of breaking up, and yet it would enable Bills affirmed in principle by the House to proceed to their legitimate end.

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Member second the Amendment?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Yes, Sir; I second the Amendment, although I did not catch its full import. So far as I understand it, it refers to Bills which have been under the consideration of the House, and which could not be considered after half-past 12. But my object in rising was more particularly to point out to the House—

MR. ONSLOW: I rise to Order. I wish to ask, Sir, whether it is competent for any Member to second a Motion of which he says he knows nothing?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I did not say I knew nothing about the Amendment. I said I did not comprehend it quite fully; but I understood from hon. Members around me more or less of its import. I rise, however, more particularly to notice the surprise with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken the House upon this occasion. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman gave Notice of his intention to make this Motion; but it is one of so serious a character that the House can hardly be expected to pass it without comment.

No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned the Bills which are to be sacrificed. Among them is the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill; and it is obvious that, as there were no fewer than 280 Amendments on the Paper, it would be impossible to proceed with that measure. I must, however, point out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the question which has been raised by an hon. Member opposite, and which, I think, is entitled to grave consideration by the House. I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer has conceded two days for the discussion of important subjects—one to the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and the other to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). One of the Motions refers, I believe, to the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin with respect to Greece, and the other to the water supply of the Metropolis. There is another question, which certainly ought to be discussed before Parliament rises for the Vacation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has given Notice that it will be necessary to take a Vote of Credit for the South African War. Now, I look upon that question as one of paramount importance to the House and to the country; and I think the Government ought not to be allowed to bring this Session to a close without the Chancellor of the Exchequer granting to Parliament an opportunity of once again fully discussing that question. It would be very inconvenient, and I should be loth to make a Motion for the adjournment of the House in order to bring that question before Parliament and the country; but I do hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see the necessity of granting to Parliament a day, in order that they may discuss a question which has greatly excited this country, on account of the enormous expenditure it must entail as well as on account of the gross mismanagement with which it has been conducted. Why, it was only in this day's papers I read a sermon, I think it was by Bishop Colenso, in which that worthy man prayed that the last serious occurrence, which everybody deplores, might be a harbinger of peace, and might bring to a close an unjust and unnecessary war, which has already occasioned the loss of the lives of 10,000 persons. I am allowed to discuss this question on the Motion which has been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I propose to do so now, in the hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will accord the favour to Parliament and the country of knowing more about this question than we yet do. There is one other question to which I wish particularly to refer, and that is with reference to the recent unhappy event which has prevented me from putting a Notice on the Paper, as I had intended to do. That has reference not only to what is now occurring in South Africa, but also to answers given by the Secretary of State for War on two or three previous occasions during the Session. After the Isandlana disaster there was a Court of Inquiry held. It was supposed to be in secret, and it sent home a Report. We were informed that the authorities at the Horse Guards would consider the question of making known the Report; but, up to this moment, no information has been given to the public with reference to that Court of Inquiry. Then there was a Court of Inquiry held on the subject of the Zlobani Mountain disaster, where a gallant friend of mine, Colonel Weatherley, had his whole corps—99 men out of 100—cut to pieces. I hold in my hand copies of two letters from two officers who were present on that occasion, and also a touching letter from the father of a young officer who was killed, and it is distinctly charged that certain of the men ran away, and refused to support the corps of that gallant officer—Colonel Weatherley—although, if they had supported them, as they were well able to do, the whole of the corps would have been preserved. A Court of Inquiry was held upon that disaster. We know nothing of the result; it has been kept secret. But Parliament and the country ought to be informed what is the result of Courts of Inquiry when they involve circumstances which appear to trench more or less directly on the military capacity of the men who are engaged in conducting operations. In Afghanistan, a whole squadron of the 10th Hussars was swept away in crossing a river. A Court of Inquiry was held, and the Minister for War, in answer to two Questions addressed to him by a military Gentleman in this House, said, in effect—"You ought to know that Courts of Inquiry are secret, and that their results are not communicated to Parliament. Therefore, I cannot communicate to the House what is the result of the Court of Inquiry with reference to the loss of that corps of the 10th Hussars." The results of the Courts of Inquiry to which I have just referred have been kept secret from the time of the holding until the present, and I apprehend they will not be communicated to us. But the other day a Court of Inquiry was held in South Africa, which we are told is secret; yet the result of that Court of Inquiry was published at the Cape, and is known in this country. It was given in detail—article after article, charging a gallant officer almost with cowardice in the discharge of his duties. Upon that I offer no opinion; but I wish to point out the injustice of men, of whatever rank, being placed in that position, and being made the scapegoat of offences which, for aught we know, may be due to others. Let us have justice; let every man, however humble in rank he may be, have justice, and let him not be publicly abused unjustly. That Court of Inquiry apparently held its sittings with open doors. It reported against one man, and not against two. Upon that Court of Inquiry a court martial has been held. Upon that court martial the very man who, perhaps, is most to blame in that transaction, Colonel Harrison, sits as a member. I ask—"Is this justice?" Is this the way in which our military affairs are to be conducted? Everyone who reads the history of that military event, which everyone with a heart must deplore, will see that the man who has been sent home to this country under arrest is not the only man, apparently, who is to blame; yet the result of the Court of Inquiry at the Cape has been made public, and everything has been heaped on his head as if he only were guilty; whereas this country, from the beginning to the close of these proceedings, condemns throughout the whole of the transactions the miserably inefficient conduct of the man who has conducted these military operations—Lord Chelmsford. I would not have lost the present opportunity of once again calling attention to this before Sir Garnet Wolseley arrives to stop, I hope, further loss of life, further mismanagement, and a further incapable display of military enthusiasm. I hope that, at all events, this question which I have risen to speak upon will not be lost sight of in the country, and that others here will join with me in endeavouring to point out to the Government how necessary it is that Parliament should have an opportunity of again discussing a question which has so deeply roused the sympathies and feelings of this country. This is the question which I wish to put to the Secretary of State for War, and it is a question which must be answered before we proceed to the discussion of the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill. I have opposed that Bill from the beginning, not for the purpose of obstructing the progress of the measure, but because I believe it is fraught with injustice to the soldier. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is clearly not in Order in discussing the merits of the Army Discipline Bill now.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I beg pardon of the Chair. I was carried away by my feelings. I had intended putting a Notice on the Paper; but I deferred doing so till this week. I wish to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will give any explanation as regards these Courts of Inquiry? Concealment, and worse than concealment, has been pursued as regards the Zlobani Mountain disaster, the Isandlana disaster, and also as regards what befell the troops of the 10th Hussars. Why have the results of those inquiries been kept secret, and why, in the case of Captain Carey—for I believe he is a captain now—has the result, as if it were to prejudge the case, been published at the Cape and in all the London papers? On the decision of the court martial, Captain Carey has been condemned and sent home to this country under arrest. This is a question which must be answered; and I again entreat the Government to give a day for a discussion on the War in South Africa. It is a question which goes home to the heart of everybody. It is costing us millions of pounds, and the lives of 10,000 human beings have been lost. The Government gave us assurances that they did not intend to make it a war of aggression, but merely a war of defence; whereas we read in the newspapers that Armies of from 10,000 to 20,000 men are advancing into the enemy's country. Surely those were facts which seemed to be inconsistent with the statement put forth by the Government. Now that the Government have promised to oblige the hon. Members for Chelsea and Hackney with a day for the discussion of questions in which they are interested, I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give us an opportunity of discussing a question which is of paramount importance at this moment to the honour and interests of this country.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "except in the case of Bills which stand for Consideration, as amended, or Third Reading."
—(Mr. Vans Agnew.)

Question proposed, "That these words be there added."

COLONEL STANLEY: This is not the first time, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tamworth has thought it convenient, and, I suppose, in accordance with what he believes to be his duty, to make a sudden, and, to my mind, a somewhat unjustifiable, attack upon the Government. He has attacked, without discrimination, all who are connected with the present unfortunate War in Zululand. I will say nothing as to the appropriateness of the occasion he has selected for his remarks. Only a few minutes ago, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that before long the House would be called upon to discuss and pass a Vote to meet the expenses of the Zulu War; and the right hon. Gentleman ought to have felt, as we all feel, that the proper occasion for the discussion of the conduct of the war will be when that Vote comes on for discussion. This is not the first occasion on which the right hon. Gentleman has come down and, taking advantage of his privileges, has made an attack on persons in command in South Africa without previous Notice. I hope the House will excuse me if I speak with a little feeling; but for any right hon. Gentleman to come down and discuss, without previous Notice to those who might otherwise have been in the position of defending them, the conduct of officers who have been concerned in the war, and to say that this movement, and that, and the other, had been disastrous and disgraceful, and reflected discredit upon all concerned—I say that, for a right hon. Gentleman to do this, and give no opportunity to those connected with the Service of ascertaining and making clear those facts which would enable a conclusive defence to be offered—that is, in my opinion, a course that is neither convenient to the House nor rightful towards the Public Service. With respect to the alleged concealment in the matter of the Courts of Inquiry to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, all I can say is that, as far as that charge is thrown out against me, it will lie very lightly, for I have endeavoured upon all occasions to give the fullest and most ample information to the House and the public by such means as I believed most convenient and the most readily at hand. With respect to Courts of Inquiry, I have stated on various occasions already what, with the leave of the House, I will state again—namely, that it is not the practice, and I do not think it is right or prudent to lay the proceedings of Courts of Inquiry, as such, on the Table of this House. We have had during the progress of the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill through the House a good deal of discussion with regard to these Courts of Inquiry, and I have never hesitated to express my opinion that they were not to be used as criminal courts, but were to be used for the purpose of enabling the responsible officer, through the means of others, to ascertain facts which he could not easily ascertain for himself; that their proceedings were to be looked upon as communications made to him, and that it was to his opinion only I would look. In the case of the Isandlana disaster, a great many facts were ascertained by the Court of Inquiry; and I did depart from the usual course, and did communicate to the House the substance of the facts which the Court had elicited. [Sir ROBERT PEEL: Zlobani.] With respect to that and other cases, I think the House will not expect me, without Notice, to enter upon a defence which, though I have no fear on my own account or that of others, yet, not having all the facts before me, would not be as complete as I should otherwise make it. As to relieving one officer from blame at the expense of another, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, I will observe that no word has ever escaped me in this House which would lead anyone to think that I would allow a particle of blame to be thrown upon anyone with my knowledge until the facts were before me. I have received the same information as other persons about the court martial which sat upon Captain Carey. The evidence is not before me. I have seen the statement that the trial has been held; but I have had no opportunity up to the time when I came down to the House of knowing what the decision of the court martial was, nor have I had any of the facts before me. The proceedings of the court martial had not reached the War Office; whether they had reached the Judge Advocate General I do not know. I would once for all deprecate, if the right hon. Gentleman would allow me, this system of making attacks without Notice upon persons whom the Government, from want of Notice, may not be in a position to defend as completely as would otherwise be in their power. I hope the right hon. Gentleman, if he has any other accusations of this kind to bring, will, at all events, do me the courtesy of giving such Notice as will enable me to make a sufficient reply for those in whose defence I am bound to appear.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was very glad that the House was disinclined to take upon itself the command of an Army in the field; but he regretted that, in reference to military matters, and especially those military inquiries, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, and other hon. Members who had addressed the House, should have virtually disregarded that which was a Rule of the House—that the House would not by debate interfere in any matter that was brought to trial pendente lite, lest injustice might thence be done. He had not a word to say in defence of any of the officers mentioned; but he did hold that those officers had a right to a fair trial before competent tribunals, and that this House would do well to show, in their cases at least, the same delicacy which it was its wont to observe as to expressing any opinion with respect to the innocence or the guilt of any civilian whose conduct was likely to be brought before any of the Courts. His main purpose, however, in rising on this occasion was merely to express a hope—having heard that a most important educational measure was likely to reach the House at so late a period of the Session—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked independent Members to give up to the Government nearly the whole of the time belonging to them; and if any such measure should raise a wide discussion, and was met with many Amendments, it would not be proceeded with in a thin House during the present Session. [An hon. MEMBER: What measure?] He (Mr. Newdegate) would not be in Order if he were to refer to this measure more distinctly. But he would, however, quote an analogous case. He had seen in the last Session of Parliament a very important educational measure, connected with Ireland, passed in a thin House, when not more than one-fourth, or at the most one-third, of the Members of the House could be assembled; and he hoped that, in the instance he contemplated, Her Majesty's Government would not incur the grave responsibility of taking advantage of the weariness and thinness of the House to pass a measure with Amendments that might be attempted, but which the House, when fully assembled, might not, and, he believed, would not approve. With reference to what had been said on the subject of the conduct of the Business of the House, and as to who were responsible for the delay, of which the whole country was sensible, he would only observe that the causes of that delay could easily be traced by an analysis of the proceedings and debates of the House, and that he could conceive of no subject which more than that would be worthy the early attention of the House in the next Session of Parliament.

Sir JOHN LUBBOCK said, he did not rise to oppose the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which, indeed, he thought reasonable under the circumstances; but he hoped the Government would give their favourable consideration to the Amendment. He had charge of a measure which had passed several times through second reading, and he continually received letters asking him when the third reading would be taken. He had some difficulty in making his correspondents understand that one Member could, by using—he would not say abusing—the Forms of the House, prevent a measure from passing. He submitted to the House that to accept the Amendment would give effect to the wishes of the House, and the expenditure of a little time now would save a great deal next Session.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE had supported the Ancient Monuments Bill throughout, and would do so again; but, even to pass it, nothing would induce him to tamper with the Half-past 12 Rule, which he held to be invaluable, not less with a view to the Business, than to the health of the House.

MR. DILLWYN said, he did not think any time would be gained by taking Tuesdays and Wednesdays if the proposed Amendment were adopted.

MR. SULLIVAN took that opportunity of reminding the Chancellor of the Exchequer of his promise to produce the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley. Now that he had arrived in South Africa, there should be no further delay in laying them on the Table. It was of great importance, as the House was about to adjourn in two or three weeks, that they should know whether the country was on the verge of a prolonged war. He observed from the latest information that the Army in South Africa was steadily advancing; and it was, therefore, most necessary they should know what really were the instructions which had been given to Sir Garnet Wolseley. He should also like to know whether the Government seriously intended to introduce to the notice of this House the famous University Bill, of which they had heard something "elsewhere?" If they did, he thought they would be like the sailor who cut off a few inches from the top of his blanket and sewed them on at the bottom. A great deal had been said about obstruction; but there was one serious form of obstruction to which sufficient attention had not been drawn, and that was the manner in which certain hon. Members availed themselves of the Half-past 12 o'clock Rule, in violation of the universal sentiments of the House, to stop the further progress of Business. The other day he asked for a Return with regard to the state of public business in Dublin, which he believed the Government were prepared to grant. He had seen sworn affidavits that in certain offices suitors had to wait for three or four years for a return of their accounts in Chancery. He had, however, no sooner put his Notice on the Paper than a Member on the Government side of the House put a blocking Notice against it, and thus the public of Ireland were precluded from getting information which they had a right to receive. Again, last Friday he asked for a Return as to the arrests for drunkenness on Saturday in Dublin. The information existed in Dublin, and he believed the Government would have allowed its production, because it was not a matter calling for the expression of any opinion; but it was simply asking for public statistics, which would show their own tale. A Government supporter, however, had availed himself of this vicious system of obstruction, and had placed a Motion on the Paper opposing the granting of the Return after half-past 12 o'clock.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, it is probably convenient that considerable latitude should be given to a discussion of this character; but I must say that some of the subjects introduced, especially in the speech of my right hon. Friend who seconded the Amendment, appeared to me somewhat irrelevant. I must say I could see no connection between his speech and the Amendment relating to the third reading of Bills which had reached that stage. But, no doubt, my right hon. Friend saw some connection, which he was unable fully to explain to the House.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Does the noble Lord say I cannot explain the connection? ["Order!"] I beg to explain the connection I saw. The Chancellor of the Exchequer opened the full ground of discussion on the questions that were to come before us, and I took the liberty of calling the attention of the House to one which I thought important.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The speech of my right hon. Friend may have been a protest against the Motion; but, as a matter of fact, he did not speak on that Motion. He seconded the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wigtownshire, which had reference to the third reading of the Bills which had reached that stage. Whether it was appropriate or not, it is to be regretted that a question of the kind he brought forward should have been introduced, as the Secretary of State for War complained, without Notice. My right hon. Friend complained that the proceedings of certain Courts of Inquiry had not been laid on the Table; and he also made some very strong comments on the mode in which military operations had been conducted in South Africa. Now, as to Courts of Inquiry, I have not observed that my right hon. Friend has placed any Notice on the Paper for the production of Papers relating to Courts of Inquiry which he desires to see, and if he wishes to call in question the conduct of military operations in South Africa he will have an ample opportunity of doing so when the Vote of Credit is proposed. My right hon. Friend is really the most irregular Member in the House.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I rise to Order, Sir. I wish to know, Sir, whether those words are Parliamentary in the spirit in which they were uttered, and whether it is justifiable for the noble Marquess to apply them to a Member of this House?

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord has made no observation which calls on me to interpose.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: If I have said anything offensive to the right hon. Baronet I should wish to withdraw it. I will withdraw the observation that my right hon. Friend is irregular, and I will say that his conduct is extremely irregular. My right hon. Friend seems to think we are here, not for the purpose of doing any Business, or even for the purpose of formally discussing the Motion on the Paper, but simply for the purpose of hearing eloquent speeches from him at the time and season he considers it most convenient to deliver them. I do not want to go further into the discussion of the subject which has been raised. I would only say, with regard to the speech of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), and the speech of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), that they appear to me to raise some very important questions for the consideration of the House, although they did not do so at any unnecessary length. I have said, in the course of discussions in the present Session, that much of the delay in the progress of Public Business is owing, undoubtedly, to the fact that this House undertakes to do a great deal more Business than it is possible for it to do. I have expressed the opinion that until the House very seriously considers the manner in which it conducts its Business, and is willing to undertake a much greater control over the Business which comes before it, we shall find this a constantly increasing evil. As to the observation of the hon. Member for Mayo, that a remedy may be found in allowing Local Bodies to transact more of their own local affairs than they do now, I do not think there is any very great difference between him and the House upon the subject. We should all be willing to entertain any reasonably conceived proposal to transfer some Business from this overworked House to Local Bodies. There may be a difference of opinion when we come to consider what those local affairs are, and what the Local Bodies which are to transact them may be. It seems to me this House would be willing to give a full and favourable consideration to that subject whenever it may be brought forward. The immediate object with which I rose was to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to let us have a clear understanding as to the engagement he gave the other night about the Motion of the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) about the Berlin Treaty. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would be willing, in present circumstances, to give the 22nd of July, for which the Motion now stands in the Notice Paper; but it would be as well the understanding should be made clear, and also that it should be understood whether the Motion stands for the Day Sitting, or only for the Evening Sitting after 9 o'clock. I would even express a hope that the Government would see their way to giving the whole day to the discussion—a course which, in the end, would probably be the most convenient to them, as the subject is a large one; and if the debate were commenced at 9 o'clock a Motion for adjournment could hardly be resisted, and would involve the loss of another day; whereas, if the whole day were given, the subject would probably be disposed of at one Sitting.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON quite agreed with what had fallen from the noble Marquess, that much time would be saved if hon. Members would confine their observations to the subject immediately under discussion. But it was not to be wondered at that when the Government sought to secure all the available time of the House except Friday evenings and the occasions when Supplementary Estimates would be submitted, individual Members interested in particular subjects should take the opportunity of offering some remarks on the position in which they were placed. It depended on the arrival of despatches from South Africa when the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to submit Supplementary Estimates; but, no doubt, he would take the earliest opportunity consistent with the demands of other urgent Business. As to the court martial, it appeared to be possible that the subject might pass out of public ken and discussion before there would be an opportunity of saying a word on the subject in the House. The proceedings might be submitted to Her Majesty for confirmation before anybody in the House had the opportunity of asking a question upon them. He did not wish to prejudge anything; but if the court martial should result in pains and penalties to one man only of all the officers concerned in the lamentable occurrence, there would be a strong feeling of indignation in the country.

MR. E. JENKINS said, that when these gusts occurred between Members in high latitudes, Members below the Gangway naturally felt it was their duty to let them blow themselves out. He, however, felt some doubt as to the propriety of the attack which had been made by the noble Lord upon the right hon. Baronet, seeing that every possible obstacle had been put in the way of the discussion of the subject which the right hon. Gentleman wished to bring before the House. The Government must not be surprised if irregular opportunities were taken for bringing forward subjects when other advantages for doing so were regularly refused. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would adhere to his former assurance that the South African question should be discussed in the month of July.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN desired to know whether it was intended to pass the Noxious Gases Bill?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked whether the Government were prepared to drop that portion of the Public Works Loans Bill to which many hon. Members of the House objected, in order to make the Bill similar to that which was usually passed for supplying the necessary funds to the local authorities? If that were acceded to, he believed that the progress of the Bill would be very much accelerated.

MR. O'CLERY said, he wished to say a few words as to the desirability of passing a measure which, in his humble opinion, was one of vast national importance—he meant the Bill authorizing the enrolment of Volunteer Corps in Ireland. It had passed a second reading after considerable discussion; it had been in Committee, and had been brought up on Report; and it now stood for third reading. But Notice of opposition had been given, and that Notice, under the Half-past 12 Rule, virtually took away all chance of passing the Bill into law this Session. He earnestly entreated the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. De la Poer Beresford), who had placed the Notice on the Paper in the exercise of his undoubted right, to withdraw the Notice. The hon. Member was present when the Bill was in Committee, and he never made the slightest sign of opposition, and he was present when the Report of the Committee was submitted, and the question was put whether there was any Amendment, and he was silent. Failing that appeal, he (Mr. O'Clery) must urge on the Chancellor of the Exchequer the expediency of his affording facilities for the Bill to be passed. He ventured to say that there was not a Member in the House, except the hon. Gentleman the Member for Armagh, who was opposed to the measure; and it would cause dissatisfaction in Ireland, if a measure of that kind, to which no one had made any objection, were killed by what he did not fear to call deliberate obstruction. The hon. Member had given no reason whatever for his action. He (Mr. O'Clery) had abstained from opposing the Vote for English Volunteers, because he considered there was a reasonable chance of his Bill being passed; but it must be remembered that at present Irish money was taken for English Volunteers, while Irishmen were denied the right of bearing arms in the national defence. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give him an opportunity of submitting the Bill to a third reading before half-past 12.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had listened with the greatest possible pleasure to the remarks of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, who had shown that he was quite aware that in every deep there was a deeper still. Hon. Members below the Gangway on that side were accused of extreme irregularity, and he was glad that the noble Lord had been able to find an instance of still greater irregularity on the Conservative side. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) begged the House to remark that the only person who had really risen to the height of that great occasion—the sacrifice of the innocents which occurred once every Session—was his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), who pointed out that there was only one remedy for the annual holocaust, and that was to remove from the House a considerable portion of the work which the House was incompetent to pass, not only from want of time, but on account of its ignorance. It was utterly impossible that hon. Members living in Great Britain could know what were the feelings and wishes of persons living in Ireland; and every year irritation was caused by the rejection of measures brought forward by the Representatives of Ireland. Well, who had attempted to remedy that state of things, and to enable the House of Commons to discharge its duties to the country? Only one class of Members—that class called Home Rule Members. When the noble Marquess spoke of its being desirable to adopt some method of removing a great mass of local legislation from the House when local legislation stopped the way, whom had they a right to expect to put out a helping hand? Undoubtedly, the responsible Leaders in the House. They—the Home Rulers—had made their proposition for self-government, and the House rejected it by an immense majority; but the evil still remained, and even those who were most opposed to that proposal now began to feel where the shoe pinched. Year by year it would become more and more impossible to avoid those disagreeable scenes which had occurred in the House this Session, and to prevent the country from feeling that the House of Commons had lost its hold over the people, because it was unable to perform its work. What were the Bills of the Government? There were, among others, the Army Discipline Bill, the Criminal Code Bill, and a Bill on Banking. Would not these three Bills, if properly discussed, be enough for a single Session? If the whole time of the House had been given to them, it would have been a good year's work to pass them into law. But these measures were constantly obstructed by other Bills—Bills relating to other portions of the United Kingdom as well as to England. The noble Marquess had shown that he was alive to the subject, and he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) hoped the Government would become alive to it too. The Government had showered its blessings on Ireland by dangling before that country measures which were to be introduced; but had not brought any of them near enough to be grasped. Let the Government next year bring in a measure to remove from the House of Commons this mass of legislation, or if the occupants of the two Front Benches should change places, let the noble Marquess himself bring in a measure of the kind. But before the Session closed, and Home Rule Members were sent home with the stigma which it was sought to lay upon them of obstructing the Business of the House, let the Government do them the justice to show that they were the only persons who had ever made a proposition to the House which would radically cure the congestion of Business. Hon. Gentlemen had immense reason to complain that, after they had brought their Bills up to the third reading, they should be unable at the last moment to carry them further; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer might very well accede to the appeal just made to him, and allow facilities for passing the Volunteer Corps Bill, the only measure relating to Ireland which had anything like conciliation in it. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) supposed the appeal would be of no use, and that next Session they would have a similar list of measures introduced which would have to be similarly sacrificed at the close, and that there would be the same wrangling and recrimination as before, because the Government would not take the proper steps to remedy the evil.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am perfectly aware that every year, when it is necessary to make arrangements for abandoning certain Bills, it is only natural that observations should be made, and that hon. Gentlemen interested in particular measures should criticize the proceedings of the Government. We are by no means unwilling to be criticized, as our Predecessors have been; but I cannot help thinking that on the present occasion the discussion has travelled somewhat beyond due bounds. The South African War is, no doubt, a subject of great importance and interest; but after the announcement I made that a Vote of Credit would be asked for, and considering, as I have to-night been reminded, that I have pledged myself to bring it forward in the month of July, I think it would have been more convenient had the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) abstained from the observations he has made. Fragmentary discussion on the subject is not convenient, and it is rather hard that we should hear observations made which are a prejudging of a case which is not now fully before us. I cannot admit, Sir, that the abandonment of Bills necessarily involves a waste of time. The discussions to which they give rise are sometimes very advantageous in paving the way for the passing of measures in a subsequent Session. For example, the Criminal Code Bill, which the Government were so reluctantly obliged to drop, could hardly fail to gain, when next introduced, by the criticisms which have been passed upon it this Session. The noble Lord opposite has asked me what we propose to do with reference to the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke)? The hon. Baronet has put his Motion down for the Evening Sitting to-morrow week, and I have promised that I should give him that evening, or some corresponding evening, in the event of the House agreeing to the proposal which we now make. I think it would be convenient that the discussion should be taken upon the day originally fixed, and I am afraid it may not be in our power to dispense with a Morning Sitting on that day; but I should be glad to be allowed to think a little over the subject before making final arrangements. At all events, we shall not propose to take that particular evening for Government Business. Should the proposal which we have now made be agreed to, we shall not propose to meet to-morrow until 4 o'clock. A question has been put to me as to the Noxious Gases Bill; and it is our intention to proceed with that measure. In regard to the Public Works Loans Bill, I shall shortly state the course which it is the intention of the Government to take. With respect to the Amendment of my hon.

of his original programme, but after that Parliament had been a year or two old, had been a great deal more successful than had the domestic legislation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in that House. The noble Earl had been successful in carrying out his policy against the opposition of the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs; but the Government had not been successful in that House in their policy of carrying imperfectly conceived measures without an Amendment. That was notoriously established in the Sessions of 1877-8, and again this Session. He thought it necessary to refer to charges which were as absurd as they were untrue. He, and those who agreed with him, did not wish to throw out the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill. In fact, he should be very sorry if it were thrown out. All they asked was that reasonable time should be given for the consideration of the Amendments to that measure. There was yet ample time, without having recourse to such a measure as that which was adopted on the South African Bill, for which they were now paying the penalty. But even if there should not be time, it would not be difficult to renew the old Mutiny Act, reducing the number of lashes to 25. That would not be so dreadful an alternative to have recourse to. He thought the spectacle of one side of the House embarking in a physical contest—not a contest of brains—against the other would be one that would not result to the honour and dignity of the House. He, therefore, asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give Irish Members English fair play in connection with the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill—a course of conduct which would evoke Irish fair play from himself and his Friends.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that if the announcement of the Government, that they intended to get through the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, was the reason for making this demand on the time of private Members, he, for one, would suggest that the best thing they could do was to renew the old Mutiny Bill until next year, and have the Army Bill brought in again next year after due consideration. If anyone would compare the simplicity and humanity of the provisions of the German Army Bill with those of the Government Bill, they would be ashamed of the time that had been expended on the latter.

MR. VANS AGNEW expressed his willingness to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, for the remainder of the Session, Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motions upon Tuesdays, Government Orders having priority; and that Government Orders have priority upon Wednesdays.

AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of YARMOUTH) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as followeth:—

"I have received your Address, praying that a Commission may be issued to inquire into the depressed condition of the Agricultural interest and the causes to which it is owing, whether these causes are of a temporary or permanent character, and how far they have been created or can be remedied by legislation, and I have given directions that a Commission shall issue for this purpose in accordance with your request."

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day which are appointed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock, be deferred till To-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 10th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Clase 3 (Division of Act).

MR. J. BROWN thought that if the definitions of the Bill were brought to the front of it, its provisions would be rendered thereby much plainer and more easily understood by those persons to whom it was applicable. There could be no stronger argument in favour of the Amendment which he had to propose than that drawn from their experience of the course of this Bill through Committee; for it would, he thought, be admitted that if hon. Members had had the definitions presented to them in the first part of the Bill, instead of at the end of it, they would have better understood its application, and much time would in consequence have been saved. For instance, it was not until a comparatively late clause was reached that the Committee knew whether the term "soldier" included non-commissioned officers or not, and from that circumstance great confusion had resulted. He was quite sure, inasmuch as the Bill was to be interpreted by soldiers and not by lawyers, who would, of course, turn to the Definition Clauses at once, that it would be much better understood if the definitions were placed in the front of the Bill. The necessity for a clear view of the application of the Bill was especially apparent in the case of soldiers being called out for the suppression of riot, when, perhaps, without their being aware of it, they immediately entered upon active service, which fact, if it were not made perfectly clear and put plainly before the soldier, might be the cause of his getting into difficulty when so called upon. In these circumstances, and seeing that the Definition Clause had been postponed, he trusted that the Secretary of State for War would agree to the Amendment standing in his name. He moved to insert in page 1, line 14, after "Part I.," the words "Definitions and," for the purpose of securing the object which he had indicated.

COLONEL STANLEY saw in the arguments of the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. J. Brown) no sufficient reason for the insertion of definitions in a place which, in his opinion, did not belong to them. He thought that, perhaps, some time had been lost to the Committee by the Bill not having, in some cases, been thoroughly read beforehand, which might otherwise have been saved; but he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 69 (Power of Her Majesty to make rules of procedure.)

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had rather expected some statement from the Secretary of State for War with regard to this clause. When the Bill was introduced, a good deal of capital, so to speak, had been made out of the circumstance that the Articles of War were to be abolished; but he wished to point out to the Committee that the new clause referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would, practically, give powers to make Articles of War. The present clause also gave power to alter matter in the Bill of a very serious character, which had been discussed by the Committee. It was true that nothing was to be done contrary to this Act; but it appeared to him extraordinary that the Secretary of State for War should claim for himself power to change the constitution of courts martial. He could not imagine any case in which the Secretary of State for War could exercise the power of changing the constitution of a court martial, without doing a thing contrary to this Act. The power seemed to him to be unnecessary; but if the Secretary of State for War would show him in what cases it would be useful, he would, of course, withdraw his Amendment. He moved, in page 38, line 22, to leave out the words "and constituting," thinking that the constitution of courts martial should remain sacred.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he could not help thinking that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had been under a misapprehension with regard to this clause. As far as he (Colonel Stanley) had been able to ascertain, by inquiry from competent advisers, nothing could be more clear than the fact that the section in no way authorized any Secretary of State to depart, in the slightest degree, from the course prescribed in the clauses of the Bill. The powers of the present section referred to small matters of procedure which could not be allowed to encumber the Bill, and which from time to time might have to be altered. For instance, the Volunteers had a right, under certain circumstances, to have courts martial composed of their own officers. That was a rule which from time to time might have to be modified, and, amongst others, afforded an instance in which the power of the clause would be useful. He repeated, that he had been advised, on the best authority, that nothing in the section gave power to the Secretary of State to go one atom beyond this Act.

MR. HOPWOOD wished to point out that the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, that the object of the section was the regulation of small matters of detail, was surpassed by the language used in the clause itself.

SIR HENRY JAMES suggested that the following words should be added at the end of the clause—

“Provided always, That no such rules shall contain anything contrary to the provisions of this Act.”

MAJOR NOLAN said, he would withdraw his Amendment, and would not move the next Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, to add after the word “say,” in line 21, the words “the assembly and procedure of courts of inquiry.”

Amendment agreed to.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that the clause was entirely new, and that reference was made to its provisions neither in the old Mutiny Act nor in the Articles of War. It was a very sweeping thing to say—

“Subject to the provisions of this Act, Her Majesty may, by rules to be signified under the hand of a Secretary of State, from time to time, make, and when made, repeal, alter, or add to, provisions in respect of the following matters, or any of them; that is to say . . . (7.) Any matter in this Act directed to be prescribed.”

The words appeared to him to embody the general sense of the Bill as it existed before it went through the Committee, and to give enormous power to a Secretary of State which had never been conferred by the old Mutiny Act. He moved that sub-section 7 be left out, in order that an opportunity might be given to the Secretary of State for War to afford some explanation.

COLONEL STANLEY thought that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had overlooked the fact that the rules of procedure were, for the first time, being made Parliamentary. These rules were, in future, to be laid before Parliament. The clause was, undoubtedly, a new one, and alluded to a great many matters which could not possibly be recited in this Act; but he wished to make it clear to the hon. and gallant Member that by it nothing could possibly be done contrary to the Act.

The sub-section in question was intended to apply to such things as the forms prescribed in cases where regimental returns were required to be made up by officers, and which, from time to time, might have to be modified.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR HENRY JAMES moved to add after the word “law,” in line 35, the words—

“Provided always, That such rules shall contain nothing contrary to or inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.”

Amendment agreed to.

SIR ROBERT PEEL moved, in page 38, after line 42, to insert—

“Whenever a court of inquiry is assembled to investigate any matter affecting the conduct or character of an officer or soldier, such officer or soldier shall be entitled to receive a copy of any opinion which may be delivered by such court; and, if the officer who convenes the court of inquiry shall prefer to instruct the court to receive evidence only and not to deliver an opinion, the officer or soldier whose conduct or character has been called in question shall be entitled to demand that the officer who convenes the court of inquiry shall himself deliver an opinion upon the matter which has been the matter of investigation, and a copy of such opinion shall be delivered in writing to the officer or soldier concerned.”

COLONEL STANLEY remarked, that he had already proposed rules with regard to Courts of Inquiry which had been laid upon the Table of the House.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that they had proceeded so rapidly through the Bill that he was not aware that it was proposed to put these rules in the Bill. He had intended to have put a Notice on the Paper with regard to this matter; but, owing to certain circumstances, was prevented from doing so. With respect to the observations of the noble Marquess, referring to him in the discussion which had preceded this matter, he thought that the Committee would agree with him that they were fully entitled to consider the bearing of these provisions with respect to what had recently occurred in South Africa.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked, that the right hon. Baronet would not be in Order in referring directly to what had passed in the House.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he wished to point out that he considered it would be very desirable that the proceedings of these Courts of Inquiry should be as clear as possible, and in support of this it was only necessary to mention a recent case which occurred at the relief of Ekowe, where a Court of Inquiry was held upon a sergeant, who was sentenced to five years' penal servitude. The sentence of the Court was sent for revision to the Judge Advocate, and the non-commissioned officer returned to this country. It was found, on inquiry at home, that the evidence was so much in favour of the sergeant that he was allowed to join the 3rd battalion of the 60th Rifles. He thought this matter was really in point to show how necessary it was to bring these Courts of Inquiry before the attention of the House. He would point out that it was highly desirable that the Government should lay upon the Table of the House the proceedings of the different Courts of Inquiry that had been held during the course of the present year. A Court of Inquiry was held with reference to the accident that happened to the 10th Hussars in crossing the Cabul River, when a troop was washed away. An hon. Member opposite asked the Government whether the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry which investigated the cause of the disaster had been forwarded to this country to the proper authorities. In reply to an inquiry addressed to them by the hon. and learned Member for King's County (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock), the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War stated that the decisions of those courts had hitherto been kept secret, and that there was no reason, in the particular case referred to, to depart from the ordinary rule. It was very important to notice the reply which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War gave to that question, for it showed how the Government had changed its opinions on this point since the 26th of June. It now appeared by the regulations which had been put into the hands of hon. Members that morning that the Government were prepared to allow the officer or soldier, tried by a Court of Inquiry, to have a copy of the opinion arrived at. This was an important concession, and he wished to point out that as the Government had made that concession now, it would be highly desirable that they should favour the use of Commons, and the country, with the results of the Court of Inquiry into the Isandlana disaster. He did not know whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was prepared to consent to lay upon the Table of the House the result of that inquiry. There was another point to which he wished also particularly to bring to his notice. A Court of Inquiry was held in reference to the disaster at the Zlobani Mountain. That was a most serious disaster, as a whole corps was cut to pieces; and from letters which he had received he had no doubt that there was very good cause for holding a Court of Inquiry. He believed the Government were in possession of the results of these inquiries, and he thought it would be far better if they were to adopt his suggestion, and since they had put this Memorandum into the hands of hon. Members that they would also lay upon the Table of the House the results of these inquiries, and it would then be unnecessary to move for the Reports. He wished further to point to a question which arose in connection with the proceedings of another Court of Inquiry recently held at the Cape. A great act of injustice had been done to one officer by the publication of the finding of that Court of Inquiry. He held in his hands a copy of that Report, dated Landsman's Drift, June 10th. It should be remembered that that Court of Inquiry was ordered by Lord Chelmsford. Lord Chelmsford also ordered the Court of Inquiry into the Isandlana disaster; but the Report of the inquiry into the most recent disaster had been published contrary to all previous practice.

THE CHAIRMAN was bound to point out to the right hon. Baronet that he understood him to be about to move an Amendment of which he had submitted the words. He had then understood that he was about to depart from that intention, and said he would conclude by another Amendment. He wished to say that it would be convenient to the Committee that he should furnish him with the terms of that Amendment; for so far as the right hon. Baronet had gone at present he did not see precisely the connection between the observations he was now making and the subject-matter before the Committee.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked, whether observations with reference to Courts of Inquiry that had recently taken place at the Cape were not in Order upon the subject-matter before the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he would be able to answer that question when he had heard the right hon. Baronet propose his Amendment.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he would read his Amendment. It was as follows:—

"Whenever a court of inquiry is assembled to investigate any matter affecting the conduct or character of an officer or soldier such officer or soldier shall be entitled to receive a copy of any opinion which may be delivered by such court; and if the officer who convenes the court of inquiry shall prefer to instruct the court to receive evidence only, and not to deliver an opinion, the officer or soldier whose conduct or character has been called in question shall be entitled to demand that the officer who convenes the court of inquiry shall himself deliver an opinion upon the matter which has been the subject of investigation, and a copy of such opinion shall be delivered in writing to the officer or soldier concerned."

He thought he was perfectly in Order in moving that Amendment upon the proposed clause of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. He had understood the Chairman of Ways and Means to rule that he was not in Order in moving that Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN had understood that the right hon. Baronet had at first intended to move that Amendment, but had changed his intention.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he had not wished to move the Amendment if the Government had acceded to his suggestion. He thought his remarks were relevant to the subject before the Committee. His contention was, that when the conduct of an officer or soldier was investigated by a Court of Inquiry, then it was just and right that that officer or soldier should receive a copy of the opinion of the Court.

COLONEL STANLEY wished to interrupt the right hon. Baronet for the purpose of pointing out, if he were in Order in doing so, that there was some misapprehension on this matter. He had promised to put into the Bill the rules of procedure for Courts of Inquiry in addition to the rules of procedure for courts martial. Inasmuch as there had been a good deal of controversy about these matters, he wanted to make his intentions perfectly clear; and he had placed, for the convenience of the Committee, a draft of the regulations which he proposed to lay before Parliament in the hands of hon. Members. He had done that in an informal shape, no doubt; but it was for the convenience of circulation. From the Memorandum it would be seen that he proposed that—

"Whenever any inquiry affects the character of an officer or soldier, full opportunity must be afforded such officer or soldier of being present throughout the inquiry, and of making any statement he may wish to make, and of cross-examining any witness whose evidence, in his opinion, affects his character, and of producing any witnesses in defence of his character."

Then, by Section 10 of the Memorandum it was provided—

"When, in consequence of the assembling of a court of inquiry, an opinion adverse to the character of any officer or soldier is formed by the officer who determines the case so inquired into, whether such officer be the officer who assembled the court or a superior officer to whom the case has been referred by such last-named officer, such adverse opinion shall be communicated to the officer or soldier against whom it has been given."

He wished particularly to draw attention to these matters, because a great deal of misapprehension had arisen as to Courts of Inquiry. He wished distinctly to state that a Court of Inquiry was not in strictness a judicial tribunal; but was simply an assembly of persons to collect evidence in any case in which a commanding officer could not himself make the inquiry. He wished to emphasize that fact, because the right hon. Baronet had seemed to suppose that a Court of Inquiry was a tribunal appointed to try an officer or soldier. It was perfectly erroneous to suppose that any person was tried before a Court of Inquiry. A Court of Inquiry was not empowered to exercise any of the functions of a tribunal, and if any such Court assumed those functions, he was of opinion that they would be entirely in the wrong, and the object of the rules proposed was to prevent that being done.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that no doubt the use of the word "trial" with respects to these Courts was a mistake; but he still maintained that the Amendment which he had proposed gave a larger scope to the persons arraigned than that suggested by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, who simply said that—

"Whenever any inquiry affects the character of an officer or soldier, full opportunity must be afforded such officer or soldier of being present throughout the inquiry, and of making any statement he may wish to make, and of cross-examining any witness whose evidence, in his opinion, affects his character, and of producing any witness in defence of his character."

He felt very deeply upon these matters, and thought the subject was one which required the serious attention of the military authorities. It would be much better to provide, as was done by his Amendment, that a copy of any opinion which might be delivered by the Court of Inquiry affecting the conduct or character of an officer or soldier should be delivered to him. He could not conceive it desirable that in some cases the results of Courts of Inquiry should be kept secret, and that in other cases, in view of extraordinary circumstances, the results should be known. He thought that in all cases the results should be published at the place where the Court of Inquiry was held. It appeared to him that this was a matter of great importance; and he trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would agree to his very reasonable suggestion that whenever a Court of Inquiry was assembled to investigate any matter affecting the conduct or character of any officer or soldier, such officer or soldier should be entitled to receive a copy of any opinion that might be delivered by such Court.

COLONEL STANLEY wished again to impress on the Committee the regulations proposed in the Memorandum. By Section 8 he provided that—

"A court of inquiry will give no opinion on the conduct of any officer or soldier, and the proceedings of a court of inquiry cannot be given in evidence against an officer or soldier. Nevertheless, in the event of an officer or soldier being tried by court martial in respect of any matter or thing which has been reported on by a court of inquiry, such officer or soldier shall be entitled to a copy of the proceedings of the court of inquiry."

He thought that that provision entirely met the justice of the case.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN observed that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had stated that a Court of Inquiry was only instituted for the purpose of giving a commanding officer information which he could not otherwise conveniently obtain. If that were the case, no reasonable objection could be offered; but, unfortunately, there had been cases in which Courts of Inquiry had been used against officers for a very different purpose. It was necessary for him, in illustrating this remark, to mention to the House a case which he knew was not at all popular. He alluded to the case of Colonel Dawkins, an officer of the Guards, whose case had before been brought to the attention of the House. He had performed his duty with credit as an officer of the brigade of Guards; but he had the misfortune to disagree with Lord Rokeby, who commanded the brigade of Guards, and, in consequence of that difference, he was made the subject of a Court of Inquiry. He would say that Colonel Dawkins was tried, were it not certain that he would be told that no trial had taken place. But what happened was, that Colonel Dawkins was sent before a Court of Inquiry, and a man whose commission was worth £8,000 or £9,000 was taken out of the Army on its recommendation. Not a single statement could be made contrary to the honour of Colonel Dawkins as an officer and a gentleman, and instead of trying him by a court martial a Court of Inquiry was held. His Royal Highness would not go to a court martial, and a secret investigation was held by a Court of Inquiry. He was using this merely as an instance of the way in which these Courts of Inquiry were used. Colonel Dawkins was found guilty by the Court of Inquiry, not of any military offence, not of any want of knowledge of his Profession; and he was removed from the Guards. The fact was, he was unpopular with certain noble Lords and persons in high position at the Horse Guards. They did not want to ask for a court martial; they preferred to use the Prerogative of Her Majesty to turn anybody out of the Army without a court martial. When this man was taken out of the Profession it possibly overturned his mind, for he was found guilty of conduct which no gentleman, in his opinion, would ever attempt to justify. He considered that Courts of Inquiry were the screw which the Horse Guards could put upon any man they did not want in order to turn him out of the Army. He believed it was the opinion of numbers of independent officers of the Army that Courts of Inquiry were not used for the purpose which they were intended for, but as means for getting rid of unpopular men. He thought that the matter to which the right hon. Baronet had directed attention deserved the attention of the House, and if he went to a Division on his Amendment he should certainly support him.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that if the hon. Baronet would be good enough to read the 8th of the proposed regulations he would see that—

“A court of inquiry will give no opinion on the conduct of any officer or soldier, and the proceedings of a court of inquiry cannot be given in evidence against an officer or soldier. Nevertheless, in the event of an officer or soldier being tried by court martial in respect of any matter or thing which has been reported on by a court of inquiry, such officer or soldier shall be entitled to a copy of the proceedings of the court of inquiry.”

He would also wish again to draw attention to the 10th rule, which carried out everything that was required by the Amendment. It stated that—

He thought, therefore, that the proposals of his right hon. and gallant Friend carried out everything that could be desired; and he did not think that it was necessary to go into a long wrangle about a matter which had been already carried out.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT wished to call attention to the manner in which this matter now stood. In the 69th clause there was nothing about Courts of Inquiry.

COLONEL STANLEY remarked, that an Amendment was put in the clause relating to Courts of Inquiry.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT had forgotten that; but he was sure that it was understood at the time they were discussing that Amendment that the regulations for Courts of Inquiry should not be put into the Bill, but should be left entirely outside the Bill. There was a general understanding with regard to that matter. There was a great objection to putting regulations with regard to Courts of Inquiry into the Bill; but it was agreed that the regulations should be communicated to the House in order that it might understand what was to be done with respect to these courts. That was the proper time, in his opinion, for making any suggestion, or proposing any alteration, in these regulations; but he did not think that it was convenient at that time to introduce into the Bill an Amendment with respect to Courts of Inquiry. They had agreed hitherto that Courts of Inquiry should be regulated by the Queen's Regulations outside the Bill. The regulations it was proposed to issue had been submitted to the House by the Government, and it would be highly inconvenient that any Amendment in these regulations should be put in the Bill.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

SIR ROBERT PEEL had understood, from the Memorandum of the proposed regulations being headed “Army Discipline and Regulation Bill,” that the regulations were to be inserted in the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought that it was not the intention to put these regulations into the Bill. These were the regulations which the Government wished the House to know that they intended to issue in the form of Queen's Regulations in accordance with their undertaking to make rules for Courts of Inquiry. The Government had merely let the House know what regulations they intended to make in accordance with the pledge which they gave in that Amendment to the clause, which stated that rules and regulations should be made for Courts of Inquiry. It was a mistake to suppose that the regulations were intended to be introduced into the Bill.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE thought that these regulations were incomplete so long as there was no provision for any officer or soldier whose conduct was under investigation having the same right of challenge as if he had been brought before a court martial; otherwise there would be an opportunity of placing upon Courts of Inquiry officers who would give such opinions as might lead to a miscarriage of justice. He might mention that at Naval Courts of Inquiry there was the same right of challenge as upon courts martial, and he could see no reason why the challenge should not be given in the case of Military Courts of Inquiry. As a case in point he might mention that of Colonel Carter, commanding the 62nd Regiment, who had a difference with his major, and a Court of Inquiry was directed by the authorities. The President of the Court of Inquiry was the brother-in-law of Major Jerome; and if Colonel Carter had had a right of inquiry he would naturally have objected as a brother-in-law of one of the officers, whose conduct was under investigation, being President of the Court. As a natural consequence, that court came to a conclusion adverse to Colonel Carter. He should, therefore, propose, as an Amendment to the 69th clause, that—

"Any officer or soldier whose conduct is being inquired into should have the same right of challenge as upon a court martial."

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER wished to join in the appeal which had been made to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) to withdraw his Amendment. The proposed regulations provided that—

"A court of inquiry will give no opinion upon the conduct of any officer or soldier. Nevertheless, in the event of an officer or soldier being tried by a court martial in respect of any matter or thing which has been reported on by a court of inquiry, such officer or soldier shall be entitled to a copy of the proceedings of the court of inquiry."

Moreover, that any adverse opinion that a Court of Inquiry might come to was to be communicated to the officer or soldier against whom it had been given. The result of the adoption of the right hon. Baronet's Amendment would be that he would put an end to the proposed regulations altogether. Everything that was required by his Amendment was really contained in the regulations, and he did not think that there was any reason for proposing the Amendment.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that it must be borne in mind that he had placed these regulations in the hands of hon. Members merely for their information, and for the purpose of showing what he intended to do. He was sorry that any misapprehension had arisen in consequence of the form in which he had put these regulations before the Committee. It was not intended to put them in the Bill; but they were simply a Memorandum of what it was intended to do. As regarded the various points which had been urged upon him, he would carefully consider them; but he would again tell the Committee that a Court of Inquiry was simply a body of persons to collect evidence for a commanding officer, and to assist him in ascertaining what the facts were upon which he should form his opinion. He thought that particular care was required in these regulations to prevent a commanding officer, who had given an opinion on the case, sheltering himself behind a Court of Inquiry.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL was unable to find a word about Courts of Inquiry in Clause 69. He understood that the Government were about to make rules for Courts of Inquiry; but why was nothing said in the Bill with regard to Courts of Inquiry? They were not told in the Bill what a Court of Inquiry was; and he thought that Courts of Inquiry should be either excluded from the Bill, or that proper explanations should be given of what Courts of Inquiry were. It was not right suddenly to insert in the Bill power to make rules for Courts of this character. Perhaps the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would be good enough to state, as this was an important matter, whether this was the first or last mention of Courts of Inquiry in the Bill?

SIR JOHN HAY remarked, that in consequence of the Amendment which had been inserted in the 69th clause, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had placed upon the Table a Memorandum of the proposed regulations for Courts of Inquiry. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Boirne), that there should be a right of challenge in cases of Courts of Inquiry, he did not think that there was any reason for giving such right of challenge. The Court of Inquiry was merely constituted to hold an inquiry into certain matters for the benefit of all concerned.

THE CHAIRMAN observed, that the question raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim would be raised by a subsequent Amendment; and, therefore, it was not in Order to discuss the right of challenge upon that Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought there was a good deal of force in the observations of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), and that Courts of Inquiry should either be dealt with entirely by the Bill or wholly outside it. It was not known to him that any mention of Courts of Inquiry was made in the Bill, and why an Amendment was to be put in referring to Courts of Inquiry he did not know. As the hon. Member had said, if a Court of Inquiry were allowed to be put in the Bill, a proper definition of it must be given. He should recommend the Government to strike out the mention of Courts of Inquiry upon Report, for he thought it ought never to have been put in at all. What the right hon. and gallant Gentleman agreed to was, that Courts of Inquiry—which were no courts at all—should be treated as matters of administration, and should be dealt with outside the Bill by the Queen's Regulations to prevent their abuse. It was contrary to the whole character of the Bill that Courts of Inquiry should be introduced into it. He would suggest that they should be exclusively treated as matter for regulation, and that no attempt should be made in the Bill to legislate for Courts of Inquiry. At a later stage of the Bill he trusted that his suggestion would be adopted, for they might waste weeks in discussion upon the subject of Courts of Inquiry upon the postponed clauses.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that Courts of Inquiry were not sanctioned, either by the Mutiny Act or by the Articles of War. From the beginning to the end not a word was said about Courts of Inquiry. The first time that Courts of Inquiry were sanctioned was in the Queen's Regulations for 1868. Before that period, Courts of Inquiry existed only according to what was called the recognized custom of the Service; but no specific rule was laid down with regard to them.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE thought that that was the proper time to discuss the subject of Courts of Inquiry. As the authorities had power to dismiss officers by a Court of Inquiry, it was as necessary for the Committee to discuss what Courts of Inquiry were as it was for them to discuss the constitution of courts martial. In his opinion, the regulations proposed were very incomplete.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that it seemed to him to be perfectly clear that Courts of Inquiry were not now recognized by law. He thought that the Government should either adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, and strike out any reference to Courts of Inquiry from the Bill, or they should give some explanation of what Courts of Inquiry were.

Sir William Harcourt

SIR ROBERT PEEL was prepared to accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). In moving his Amendment, it was under the impression that it was intended by the Government to introduce these regulations into the Bill. It was in consequence only of seeing the Memorandum of the proposed regulations that he placed his Amendment upon the Paper. If the Government would give the Committee an assurance that Courts of Inquiry should be omitted from the Bill, and that in any regulations respecting them should be contained a provision such as he had submitted, he should be content. It should be recollected that great change had been made in that matter; because he would assert, without fear of contradiction, that it was upon the finding of a Court of Inquiry at the Cape that a court martial was ordered upon Captain Carey. He did hope that the Government would give an assurance, not that they would put it in the Bill, but that they would take care that where any officer or soldier was submitted to a Court of Inquiry the proceedings of that Court should be placed in his hands, so that he might know what was charged against him.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had introduced the subject of Courts of Inquiry by mentioning them in the Bill. Clauses 42 and 43 naturally suggested Courts of Inquiry. It was provided by Clause 42 that—

“If an officer thinks himself wronged by his commanding officer, and, on due application made to him, does not receive the redress to which he may consider himself entitled, he may complain to the Commander-in-Chief, who shall cause his complaint to be inquired into, and, through a Secretary of State, make his report to Her Majesty, in order to receive the directions of Her Majesty thereon.”

Then, in Clause 43, the case of a soldier was dealt with, and the mode of complaint by a soldier was specified. The clause provided that—

“And every officer to whom a complaint is made, in pursuance of this section, shall cause such complaint to be inquired into, and shall, if on inquiry he is satisfied of the justice of the complaint so made, take such steps as may be necessary for giving full redress to the complainant in respect of the matter complained of.”

Therefore, if Courts of Inquiry were not expressly ordered by the Act, they were strongly suggested by this clause, and were, in fact, rendered almost imperative. It was impossible to leave that entirely out of the Bill. The hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Sir Arthur Hayter) said that, as no opinion on the conduct of an officer or soldier was given by a Court of Inquiry, it was no use to have a right to challenge. When that observation was made, he wished to point out that paragraph 30 of the regulations provided that a Court of Inquiry should make a Report upon what happened. There did not seem to him to be much difference between the Court of Inquiry offering an opinion, or in making a Report. If they took the case of Captain Carey, of what consequence was it whether the Court had offered an opinion, or had made a full Report? The subject of Courts of Inquiry had been introduced by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and it could not be said that it was of no consequence what opinion was given by a Court of Inquiry. It was just as important to exclude a brother-in-law of one of the parties being placed upon a Court of Inquiry as upon a court martial. It was very much the same thing as a court martial, only under another name. He could not see that there was any objection to allowing challenges against the officers composing a Court of Inquiry. When a challenge was made it was left to the majority of the Court, leaving out the person challenged, to determine whether he should continue to be a member of the Court. He did not think that such a right should be refused in the case of a Court of Inquiry. It might be very rarely exercised; but it ought to be allowed.

MR. E. JENKINS thought that the Committee had been placed in considerable difficulty by the point alluded to by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). Courts of Inquiry were not judicial courts, either in the Army or in the Navy, and had their origin entirely in the Prerogative of the Crown. The introduction into the Bill of Courts of Inquiry appeared to him to be an irregularity, for, by so doing, they were assuming to legislate for what was unquestionably a direct Prerogative of the Crown. No doubt, Courts of Inquiry had led to abuse, for they had been used as judicial courts, and their opinions had been acted upon by the Commander-in-Chief in advising Her Majesty, and officers had suffered grave injustice by reason of them. Although not judicial courts, many officers had been dismissed from the Army in consequence of representations made by them. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had pointed out the difficulties of the situation, and had endeavoured to reconcile them, and the question was whether they were reconcilable. He noticed in the regulations which had been presented to the House, and for which he felt himself bound to thank the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, that they did not go so far as was done in the case of the Navy. In the Navy, it was not competent for any officer who had sat upon a Court of Inquiry to sit also upon a court martial in the same matter, and he thought that that regulation might well be adopted in dealing with the Army.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that it had been done.

MR. E. JENKINS said, that as the Courts of Inquiry were recognized in the Act, it seemed to him that it would be better to place these rules in the Schedule. He thought there was no option in the matter, and that it would be more satisfactory if that were done. He saw the difficulty that arose from the circumstances that had been referred to; but he could not help thinking that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman might introduce this Proviso into the Bill for the purpose of safeguarding these Courts of Inquiry. He knew how these Courts had been used in an irregular manner as the basis for the dismissal of officers from the Service without court martial; and there ought to be a Proviso that any officer who felt himself aggrieved by the result of a Court of Inquiry, before he should be dismissed from the Service, should have a right to have his case sent to a court martial. He did not mean that those exact words should be introduced; but the question was simply whether what he had suggested could be done by additional regulations, or whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would introduce a Proviso into the Bill to that effect.

MR. PARNELL said, as this Amendment had been introduced into the Act, he thought the Committee should go a little further, and should also introduce a Schedule containing the regulations and the rules which the Secretary of State for War desired to adopt. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had explained very fairly that the regulations issued that day were merely an example of what was in his mind, and it was only fair that he should have a little time to go over them; but, under all the circumstances, he did not think they would be doing their duty in allowing this clause to pass unless they, at the same time, inserted in the Schedules of the Act some provisions to govern the action of these Courts of Inquiry. These Courts were now, for the first time, to be legalized; and it would be unprecedented for them to lay down certain rules and regulations as regarded courts martial, and yet not follow the same precedent in regard to Courts of Inquiry. He would suggest that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) should withdraw his Amendment, and that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) should refrain from moving his Amendment, and that the Secretary of State for War should undertake to annex a Schedule to the Bill which would contain the ideas which he thought desirable. It was manifest they ought not to give these powers without in some way limiting them, as, otherwise, they would have a Court sanctioned by the Act, and the Secretary of State for War left free to make any rules and regulations he chose, which was much more in accordance with, or, at any rate, not contrary to, the provisions of this Act. Otherwise, the Crown would have unlimited power with regard to these Courts. No doubt, the promises of the Secretary of State for War were very satisfactory with regard to the provisions he proposed to introduce; but they did not know what might happen hereafter, unless Parliament had some control over the matter.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT observed, that the Committee were on very dangerous ground; he had paid great attention to the Bill, and if they were going into this matter of regulating Courts of Inquiry, the work would take them half as long again as it had already done to make a statutory Court of Inquiry with statutory regulations, and even that would not suffice. He deplored the alteration which had been unfortunately made during his absence at dinner. If he had been there, he would have protested against it with all his might, for he knew what it would lead to. It seemed to him no part for the Committee to undertake to make regulations for the administration of Courts of Inquiry. He never understood the Secretary of State for War to give an engagement to put Courts of Inquiry into the Bill, and why this Amendment had been stuck into this clause he really did not know. He thought the best course they could now take was to get nothing more—to wait for the Report, and then cut it out. If they did not, they would get into an inextricable mess. What they should do was to adhere to the original understanding that Courts of Inquiry were not to be recognized as statutory Courts; but that regulations were to be made governing them, and that those regulations should be published and laid before Parliament. He hoped, because they had made an error in sticking these Courts into the clause by an Amendment—the consequences of which were not considered at the time—that they would not get further into the mud by endeavouring to legislate for them, but would implore hon. Gentlemen who desired the progress of the Bill not to encourage Amendments in this way, with regard to Courts of Inquiry, and he would ask them to be satisfied with the regulations to be made by the Secretary of State for War. If those regulations were not all they desired, suggestions could easily be made to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman; and he, no doubt, would give full consideration to the suggestions of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) and that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne).

SIR ROBERT PEEL was very willing to withdraw his Amendment. He had put it down because of what he saw on the Paper; but he was quite prepared to withdraw it, on the understanding that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would consider the Amendment which he had suggested.

COLONEL STANLEY explained, that he inserted this Amendment distinctly in deference to the opinions of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that something more than the publication of all regulations was necessary, and that there should be some clause in the Bill putting Courts on a more statutory footing than they had occupied heretofore. He doubted whether they were not making too much of them altogether; but if they were to recognize them to that extent, he thought there was a great deal to be said for the proposal to put them in the Bill. As far as he was concerned, it was the same thing to him whether they were statutory, or whether they were governed by regulations laid on the Table. If, however, it was thought there was any mistake about putting them into the Bill, when they came to the Report it would be very easy to strike out the Amendment. As far as he was concerned, he was not pledged one way or the other.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK hoped that the Amendment just made would not be struck out of the Report, but that it would remain a portion of the Bill. On the other hand, if any changes were to be made hereafter, he hoped they would have the fullest opportunity of considering them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE wished to know whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would accept his Amendment? He thought it was of vital importance that it should be accepted. He proposed to give any officer or soldier whose conduct was inquired into by a Court of Inquiry the same right of challenge as on a court martial. He might mention as an instance the case of Colonel Carter, who was brought before a Court of Inquiry, and the President was the brother-in-law of the person making the charge, and a personal enemy of Colonel Carter; while the two chief witnesses were two officers of his regiment whom he had had to report for intemperate habits, one of whom died afterwards from delirium tremens. Of course, such an inquiry must be a perfect mockery. There was no provision, either, as to whether or not the officers should be taken from the regiment; and they could well understand what a state things would get into, if no one but men of the same regiment could be obtained to sit on a Court of Inquiry. He would move to add at the end of the clause—

"Provided always, That any officer or soldier shall have the same right of challenge on a Court of Inquiry as on a court martial."

Amendment proposed,

In page 38, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That any officer or soldier shall have the same right of challenge on a court of inquiry as on a court martial."—(Major O'Beirne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK remarked, that, unfortunately, the Amendment was not on the Paper, and the observations of the hon. and gallant Gentleman had not reached him very distinctly. He understood his proposition was, that there should be a disqualification attached to persons who might serve on courts martial. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no! a right of challenge in courts martial.] Well, he would call the hon. and gallant Member's attention to the clause which gave Her Majesty power to make rules of procedure. It seemed to him nothing could be more proper or pertinent to the rule of procedure than to make such regulations as that to which he had alluded. It had always been the policy and practice in regard to courts martial that no one who had any interest whatever in the proceedings should sit upon them. It seemed to him that the spirit in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman moved his Amendment was perfectly correct, and quite according to precedent; and he had not the slightest doubt that any rules of procedure which were made would be in such a form as would entirely meet the objection he had raised.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE apologized for not having his Amendment on the Paper; but as these Rules regarding Courts of Inquiry were only put into the hands of hon. Members that morning, he could not, of course, formulate his Amendment earlier. The more he read these rules the more incomplete they appeared. For instance, he should like to make an Amendment that the charges to be inquired into should be placed in the hands of any officer at least a fortnight before the Court assembled. He understood the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say that his Amendment would be one of the rules of the Court.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, when the whole subject was thrown open, no doubt, this would be considered among other things.

MR. MONK understood the right hon. and learned Gentleman, on the whole, to accept this proposal; but he thought it would be very much better, if that were the case, that the Amendment should be added to the Bill. As an officer had a right of challenge on a court martial, it was only reasonable that he should have the same on a Court of Inquiry.

MAJOR NOLAN hoped the Government would either put this into the Bill or agree to put it into the regulations they were about to issue. It was not sufficient to say that the Amendment should be considered. The instance given was a proof of the necessity for the rule, for if the brother-in-law of an accuser was presiding at a court martial the person accused should certainly have a right of challenge. That right was not absolute. It only allowed the accused to object to a particular man, and then the majority would decide whether he was to sit or not.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked in what shape these rules would come before them for approval, and whether he could propose Amendments in them, and when?

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that he could only answer the question inferentially. This power of laying rules before Parliament was taken in many Acts; and these rules would, of course, be open to challenge in the same way as any others. He had given an undertaking that these rules should be laid before Parliament, and, as a consequence, the Memorandum circulated that morning was issued; but the others were not yet finished, for he had not, in fact, had time to complete them, and until they were complete they would, of course, adhere to the existing mode of procedure. He had, however, sent them out in this form with the Votes. It was a mere Memorandum of what he hoped to do and what form he thought they should take. With regard to this point of challenge, he was afraid that would be doing what he was always afraid of—namely, making too much of these Courts of Inquiry. They were merely Courts to come to conclusions about facts; and they ought not to have, and he did not want them to have, any control, directly or indirectly, over opinions. To give a right of challenge would be making them too much like courts martial; and, therefore, he could give no pledge that he could introduce them into the rules. At the same time, he thought it perfectly right and fair that any officer mixed up with the question should not be one of those to decide what the facts were. Whether he would put that in the form of a rule he could not exactly say.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON considered this a most unsatisfactory state of things. A large number of Members were of opinion that Courts of Inquiry, as conducted for the last 25 years, ought no longer to exist, or, if left at all, that they ought to be put under proper regulations; but by the statement now made Parliament was to have no control over the regulations whatever. He certainly should support the Amendment that officers should be liable to challenge. If these Courts were to be recognized as Courts, as they were by this Amendment, this Memorandum was of no earthly value to them as Members of Parliament, for they could not alter it; if it was merely laid on the Table they would have no opportunities of altering it. In two points it was very objectionable. It did not provide that the officer or soldier should have a copy, or see the instructions under which the Court was held; and, therefore, he had no means of knowing what the investigation was about, or what steps he should take to meet the implied accusation against him; and, next, it was not provided that the officer or soldier concerned should know the result of the inquiry. That was one thing which officers felt most keenly—that they should be brought into a public Court, subjected to an investigation, and yet should not know the result, and that it should be locked in the cupboards of the officials and never be known. He wished to move Amendments to that clause; but by the course now proposed he would have no opportunity of doing so. He should, therefore, certainly support the Amendment.

MR. BRISTOWE understood that these words were inserted in fulfilment of a pledge given on a previous occasion; but he by no means understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to promise anything more. These Courts were to be governed by rules and regulations made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and they were to be laid on the Table, and so be subject to Parliament. They would surely be making a great mistake by introducing into this clause anything in the nature of procedure; and, therefore, he did hope that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not go to a Division, because the Amendment was clearly directed to a point of procedure, and nothing else.

MAJOR NOLAN was surprised the hon. and learned Member did not see the extraordinary inconsequence of his remarks. They were told that they were to treat Courts of Inquiry exactly as courts martial had been treated, and that after they had carefully provided for the rules of courts martial; and, therefore, according to his own argument, they ought carefully to provide a right of challenge in Courts of Inquiry. Not only was this the proper place to move this, but it was the only place. His hon. and gallant Friend (Major O'Beirne) had very handsomely offered not to press his Amendment if what he desired was inserted in the regulations; and if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could not accept that, he certainly should advise his hon. Friend to go to a Division.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he desired to pass the Bill; but the point now raised was a very grave one indeed, going, not only to the principle of the question, but also to the very root of the Amendment which he himself proposed in Clause 43. He had heard with very great astonishment that the pledge given him several weeks ago that the principle of challenge as regarded Courts of Inquiry was not to be allowed. This was a principle which must be admitted; and, therefore, he hoped it would be inserted either in the Regulations or in the body of the Bill. It was a principle for which he always had contended, and certainly always would contend.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL observed, that it would be extremely difficult to give a right of challenge when there might be nobody to challenge, for, if everybody exercised it, it would be impossible. It was also totally impossible that any rules could be introduced into this particular section; and he would, therefore, suggest that the section should be allowed to pass, and that hon. Members who wished to introduce rules should introduce them in the Schedule of the Bill.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE did not intend to withdraw his Amendment, as the Judge Advocate General (Mr. Cavendish Ben-jack) had himself admitted that what he asked was only reasonable. As the Government would give no promise that this right would be included in the Rules, there was nothing for it but to take a Division.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON begged to call attention to paragraph 6 of the proposed regulations, which was as follows:—

“Whenever any inquiry affects the character of an officer or soldier, full opportunity must be afforded such officer or soldier of being present throughout the inquiry, and of making any statement he may wish to make, and of cross-examining any witness whose evidence, in his opinion, affects his character, and of producing any witnesses in defence of his character.”

It constantly happened that an officer was ordered to appear before a court martial, and these were the cases in which a right to challenge was contemplated. Surely, when a man was ordered to appear, that his conduct or character might be inquired into, it was most necessary that his case should come before officers who had no previous knowledge of the matter. The concession asked ought to be conceded, for if it were not, Courts of Inquiry would be ten times worse than they were before.

MAJOR NOLAN understood that this clause had been introduced in order to deal with complaints of officers and soldiers. [Colonel STANLEY: Not entirely.] At any rate, the Government had made this alteration in consequence of the discussions and complaints which Courts of Inquiry gave rise to. As to what the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had said, the right of challenge was not absolute, and only such challenges were allowed as the Courts considered fair.

COLONEL ALEXANDER observed, that the great defect of these rules was that there was no guarantee, in the event of a Court of Inquiry finding an adverse verdict to an officer, that, before his removal from the Army, he should have a court martial. Such an Amendment as that was very necessary, in order to prevent a person being practically removed from the Army, as the result of a Court of Inquiry; but nothing was said about his right to demand a court martial; in fact, there was nothing in the rules to prevent an officer being summarily removed. Courts of Inquiry should be something similar to a Grand Jury, for the purpose of informing a commanding officer whether a prima facie case had or had not been made out.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON regretted that he was not in the House at the proper time, or he would have moved the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN thought the point raised was not really a question of procedure; it was a question of the practical rights of an officer, and of his being prevented from being dismissed from Her Majesty's Service.

COLONEL ALEXANDER understood the procedure was defective.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN replied that he was quite in favour of what an hon. Member proposed, and he did not know whether the manner in which his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) proposed to carry it out was the best. He could not see, either, what it had to do with this clause, which was merely a clause giving power to make rules of procedure. If this Amendment were to be made, it certainly should be made in a separate clause, declaring that no man, as the result of a Court of Inquiry, should be dismissed from the Service without having the right to demand a court martial. It was not for that House to pitchfork things which did not belong to a clause into it; and he, therefore, thought the Amendment out of place, though he did not all dispute the importance of the point raised.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, they were now really discussing the clause proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), on page 27, "Redress of wrongs." It would be more in Order if they waited till they got to that clause.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK explained, that he proposed to insert that between 10 and 11. He perfectly agreed that in these Rules regulating Courts of Inquiry there should be some recognition of the principle of the right of challenge; and also that Courts of Inquiry should never be used in substitution for courts martial, nor that the accused should be debarred from the right to a court martial for his own justification. He might point out that this did not in the least debar the Prerogative of the Crown, even after a court martial, to dismiss an accused person, if it should think fit, without assigning any reason therefor. By his proposal, he granted both the rights of the Crown and of the individual. The point for which he contended was that the principle of the right of challenge should be introduced into the body of these rules as well as into the body of the Bill. It was quite possible that the course suggested, of inserting it in the new clause, might be the best. He would leave it to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to decide that. He maintained that every officer should have the right of a court martial, for even that would not debar the right of the Crown subsequently to dismiss him if it chose.

COLONEL STANLEY did not think, in the discussion of the 1st of May, that he ever bound himself absolutely to carry out the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sunderland. He explained his views at the time, and promised, as far as possible, to carry them out. With regard to this question of the right of challenge being inserted in these rules, his answer was that these rules and regulations would be laid on the Table of the House, and Parliament would then have an opportunity of making a Motion upon them, or of making any Amendments it chose. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), of which he had spoken, that seemed to divide itself naturally into two parts. The first part was already practically included in the regulations, while the second part raised a question of vast importance. With regard to that, when they came to the clause, he would ask the hon. and gallant Gentleman to strike out the first part of it; and, with regard to the second, to put it before the Committee, and leave it to their judgment. The Committee had already agreed to a provision which gave the Secretary of State power to frame, from time to time, rules of procedure for Courts of Inquiry, and he had laid upon the Table a Memorandum showing what his views were upon the matter. He had, therefore, given the Committee all the information which he could with respect to it; and he could not help thinking that the progress of the Bill was being delayed by the discussion of the regulations at the present moment. Those regulations could not be introduced into the Bill;

but when it became law they would be laid on the Table of both Houses of Parliament, and ample opportunity would thus be afforded for criticizing them. On the Report it would, of course, be open to any hon Member to support the words of the clause as they stood, or to move that they be omitted.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK contended that there ought, in the interests of the Service, to be a statutory recognition of Courts of Inquiry.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he did not think the answer which had been given by the Secretary of State for War to the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) was at all satisfactory. It was all very well to say that it would be open to any hon. Member to criticize the rules when they were laid on the Table of the House; but a private Member would find it impossible to obtain a day for the discussion of any Amendment which he might move proposing their rejection. The present was, he contended, the proper occasion to discuss the rules. The Bill, as he had repeatedly said, contained some very severe provisions, and would take away from the soldier various little privileges which he had hitherto enjoyed. It would not be right, therefore, he thought, to deprive them of a protection which they now had under the Articles of War which dealt with Courts of Inquiry.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government ought to give the Committee some more distinct information than they had as yet done as to whether they meant to deal with Courts of Inquiry in the Bill or not. If they intended to do so, they ought to say so at once; if they did not, then they had allowed three hours to be wasted, simply because they had not thought proper to let the Committee know what was their policy in the matter. A fatal mistake had, in his opinion, been made by the Government in introducing into the clause the words "Courts of Inquiry." If those Courts were to be made the subject of legislation in the Bill, then it would be necessary to provide as complete a machinery for them as for courts martial. He, for one, must protest against the way in which the question was being dealt with by the Government; and he would point out to them that if now, at the eleventh hour, they were determined to legislate for Courts of Inquiry, it would be impossible to go on with the Bill. He thought the Government had accepted the principle that those Courts should be dealt with by regulation; but now there was an Amendment, in which the words "Courts of Inquiry" appeared for the first time, and everybody was asking what they were; but to that question no answer had been given. It was to introduce absolute confusion into the Bill, he maintained, to make those Courts the subject of statutory enactment. He hoped, at all events, that in the interest of the progress of the Bill the Government would, without further delay, frankly tell the Committee what they really proposed to do in the matter.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, there could be no doubt that there was no intention on the part of those who framed the Bill to legislate by Statute for Courts of Inquiry. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir Henry Havelock), however, wanted to have the rules relating to them placed in the Schedule of the Bill; but that was a proposition which he did not think the Committee would act wisely in adopting, and his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War had never given it his sanction. When the rules were laid on the Table of the House there would be ample opportunity for discussing them, and making a Motion, if that should be deemed expedient, for their modification or rejection; but if they were embodied in the Bill, the result would be something like a deadlock, from time to time, in dealing with matters which ought to be the subject of a more elastic mode of treatment. He quite concurred with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) that it would be very undesirable to constitute Courts of Inquiry by the Bill.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that the observations of the right hon. Gentleman who just sat down, and of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford, had come somewhat too late, for, as a matter of fact, the Secretary of State for War had introduced into the Bill words which gave a statutory recognition to Courts of Inquiry; and he should like to ask the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, in the interests of the Army, on what principle it was that he was so anxious that Courts of Inquiry should be ignored in the Bill?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Committee were now, he thought, in a position to decide the question whether Courts of Inquiry should be dealt with in the Bill or not. That question was raised by the Amendment which proposed that soldiers should have the same right of challenge in regard to those courts as was given them in the case of a court martial.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, there was no recognition either in the Mutiny Act or the Articles of War of Courts of Inquiry, except for the redress of wrongs. They were mentioned for the first time in the Queen's Regulations in 1868.

MAJOR NOLAN pointed out that it was provided by the Articles of War that if any non-commissioned officer or soldier felt that he had been wronged in any matter affecting his pay or clothing, he might ask to have the grievance of which he complained submitted to the consideration of a regimental Court of Inquiry.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Articles of War had not the force of a Statute. They were something done by the Queen, as it were, outside the law. The real point was whether Courts of Inquiry had been recognized by the Mutiny Act, and his contention was that they had never yet been recognized by any Statute. He would advise the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War not to allow himself to be led into the supposition that he was under a pledge to anyone to introduce Courts of Inquiry into the Bill. Although the Committee could not alter what had been done already, they ought not, in his opinion, to go further in the same direction by adopting the Amendment now under discussion, containing, as it did, the words "Courts of Inquiry."

Question put.

MR. PARNELL said, some words ought, in his opinion, to be added at the end of the clause, similar to those which, as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was aware, were to be found in the Factory Act, providing that the rules which, under the operation of the clause, would have to be laid before Parliament, should be on the Table for 40 days, so that they might be subject to Parliamentary revision. There was, of course, no necessity for inserting those words on that occasion; but their insertion might be moved on the Report.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was expected that the present Bill would come into operation in the very next week, and that it might be impossible to allow the rules framed in connection with it to lie on the Table for 40 days, inasmuch as Parliament might not sit for so long a period. The point to which the hon. Member had called the attention of the Committee was one which could be discussed on the Report.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not mean to contend that the rules should not come into operation until they had been on the Table of the House for 40 days. Those rules, as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department must be aware, would come into operation from the time they were made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. In the same way, the rules connected with the Factory Act and the Prisons Act came into operation as soon as they were issued. But what he desired was that Parliament should have the right to annul the rules made by the Secretary of State for War under the present Bill if it should think fit to do so, and in the event of their being annulled by Parliament they should cease to be valid.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, that all the rules and regulations in connection with the Army were embodied in a Royal Warrant, and circulated throughout the Army. An answer which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had given to a Question which he (Colonel Arbuthnot) had put to him would, perhaps, be the most convincing proof which the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) could have that it was quite open to the House to bring about a change of the rules in question immediately after they appeared. The answer to which he alluded referred to a regulation, with regard to which he had thought it his duty to make a Motion in that House, on which occasion the Secretary of State for War gave way; so that it was quite clear it was in the power of hon. Members to bring about an alteration in any rules which might be made.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked for an explanation of the words in the clause—"All rules made in pursuance of this section shall be judicially noticed." By the present Mutiny Act it was provided that the Rules and Regulations made by the Sovereign should be taken notice of judicially in all Courts whatever, and that copies of them, printed by the Queen's printer, should, as soon as might be, be sent by the Secretary of State to the Judges of Her Majesty's Superior Courts in London, Dublin, and Edinburgh. No provision was, however, made in the clause under discussion for sending the rules framed under it to the Judges; and he should like, therefore, to know how those learned persons were to have judicial cognizance of them, and with what object the words of the Mutiny Act were omitted from the clause?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, that all Courts of Justice were supposed cognizants of an Act of Parliament, and that rules framed under the operation of the Act would have the force of an Act of Parliament.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the Committee upstairs were of opinion that they ought not to have the same authority as an Act of Parliament.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 72 (Appointment and power of provost marshal) struck out.

Clause 87 (Delivery of soldier on discharge with his wife or child at workhouse, or of dangerous lunatic at asylum).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved the omission, in page 47, line 36, of the words "or otherwise." The clause, he said, gave power to a Secretary of State to cause a soldier on his discharge, on account of lunacy, or otherwise, to be sent to the parish in which his attestation paper showed that he had been born, and the words "or otherwise" seemed to him to be so vague that it was not desirable they should be retained in the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished, in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), to move an Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name. He himself had given Notice of an Amendment on the clause which stood lower down on the Paper, and which related to a different point. The Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo had for its object to provide that a lunatic soldier, when discharged from the Army, should be sent to a lunatic asylum, instead of being made a burden upon the rates. The Committee were, perhaps, aware a very considerable change had been proposed by the Select Committee which sat upstairs to consider the whole question of poor removal with respect to the Law of Settlement. He was informed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) that that Committee had, practically, agreed to a Report in which they recommended that the Law of Settlement should be abolished, and that any person who happened to become a pauper in any locality, no matter what length of time he might have resided there, should be entitled to relief in the Union of that locality. If their recommendation were not acted upon, so much the worse would it be, in his opinion. But the Government, under the present clause, took power to send a lunatic soldier on his discharge to the parish in which it was stated in his attestation paper that he had been born, and to send his wife or child with him. Now, a very great innovation was sought to be introduced by that provision, because, in accordance with it, a soldier would be sent, not to the place in which he might have acquired a settlement, or might have spent the greater part of his life, but to the place of his birth; and assuming that the attestation paper would correctly state what that place was, still the clause would enable the Government not to carry out the existing law with regard to paupers, but to do something entirely different. He would also observe that the Committee were in ignorance of what the law of the future might be with respect to the removal of paupers; and he thought that, totally irrespective of the general law on the subject, the Government ought to establish lunatic asylums where lunatic soldiers might be taken care of at the expense of the State.

Otherwise, a very heavy charge might be imposed on the local rates of a parish which had in no way been benefited by the soldier during the best years of his life. He begged to move, in page 47, line 37, after "discharge," to leave out to "discharged," inclusive, in page 48, line 7, and insert—

"To be sent to a military asylum provided for the reception of military lunatics, and the wife or child of any such soldier may be sent to the parish in the United Kingdom in which he appears from his attestation paper to have been attested, and such wife or child, if delivered after reasonable notice in England or Ireland at the workhouse in which persons settled in such parish are received, and in Scotland to the inspector of poor of such parish, shall be received by the master or other proper officer of such workhouse, or such inspector of poor, as the case may be."

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Amendment, as moved by the hon. Member, was informal, as there was no such word as "discharged" which he proposed to omit in line 7.

MR. PARNELL said, that in that case he would at the proper time move the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his own name.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had an Amendment on the Paper which would, he thought, meet the case, for he had no wish to stereotype under the Bill anything which might be inconsistent with existing statutes on the subject of the settlement of paupers; and he, therefore, proposed that a Secretary of State might, if he thought proper, send a lunatic soldier to the parish or union to which he was removable. With that view he begged to move, in page 47, line 38, after "parish," to leave out to "and," in line 3, page 48, and insert—

"Or union to which under the statutes for the time being in force he appears, from the statements made in his attestation paper and other available information, to be removable."

He wished to point out, in reference to the proposal which stood on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Mayo, that it was open to the objection that it would make a lunatic soldier, even though he happened to have been in the Service only for a single day, chargeable on the military for the whole of his life.

MR. O'SULLIVAN contended that it was not fair to send a lunatic soldier to a workhouse, where he was sure to be badly treated. There were in workhouses no proper staff to take care of a person so situated, and if he were allowed to mix among the ordinary paupers the probability was that his malady would grow worse. He would suggest, therefore, that a lunatic soldier should on his discharge be sent to the lunatic asylum of the county to which he belonged. His wife or child might be sent to the workhouse.

MR. SCLATER-BOTH said, that as the law stood a pauper was liable to be removed to a certain parish or union; but that power was now proposed to be taken to remove a lunatic pauper directly to the asylum attached to the workhouse of that particular parish or union.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER regretted that, owing to some mistake, the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name could not be put from the Chair; but if he rightly understood what had fallen from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, he was prepared to concede the principle for which he (Mr. O'Connor Power) was contending, which was that a lunatic soldier on his discharge from the Army should not be sent to a workhouse, either of the parish in which he was born or in which he had been attested, but that, as a married man, he should be regarded as the ward of the State. It had been suggested by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that it was, technically, scarcely open to a private Member to move an Amendment which would involve an increase of the Military Estimates; but that was a very good reason why the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should take the matter into his own hands. The proposal of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was certainly an improvement on the clause as it stood; but the point raised by him (Mr. O'Connor Power's) Amendment was whether it was not the proper course to pursue to send a lunatic soldier to a military asylum after he had become broken down in the service of his country, instead of sending him to the parish workhouse for relief, or to the local lunatic asylum connected with it.

MR. SULLIVAN shared with the hon. Member for Mayo the strongest objection to put upon soldiers of the Army the degradation of pauperism because they might be visited with lunacy. He should certainly impress upon the Committee that it was most desirable that this additional stigma should not be placed on men serving in the ranks of the Army. He could see no reason why mental suffering in the Army should be treated in a degrading manner any more than other suffering on the part of soldiers. He hoped his hon. Friend would press his Amendment.

MR. RAMSAY thought that the proposal of the hon. Member for Mayo was so reasonable as to deserve the attention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, there was no degradation to a soldier in sending him to a workhouse, where everyone acquainted with these establishments would know he would be well taken care of. He did not think it would be merciful to send a lunatic soldier to an asylum, perhaps in the middle of England; it would be much better to send him to an asylum in the place he came from, where he would be near his friends. Ceteris paribus, he objected strongly to the creation of new institutions involving vast expense to the country, which would make its appearance in the Estimates. He should be sorry to see the Military Estimates charged with the maintenance of lunatic soldiers who had only served a short time; but in the case where they had served for a long time, and then lost their reason, he certainly thought that the Military Estimates should bear the expense?

MR. BIGGAR thought that the wife and child should be sent to the place where the wife would be chargeable, supposing she was a widow. If the wife was to be sent to the workhouse at all, the best plan would be to send her to the place where she was married, and where she would probably be amongst friends. If she was sent to the place where her husband was attested, she would probably close her days in the workhouse. He certainly thought that the place where the marriage took place should be chargeable.

MR. P. MARTIN said, under the provisions of the existing code even Poor Law authorities had no power to remove a native of Ireland, who might become insane in England, back to Ireland. The clause, without some alteration of the kind which was proposed by an Amendment on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Meath, would give the Secretary of State a power which at present he did not possess by Statute—namely, to send to Ireland a lunatic soldier whose attestation paper showed him to have been born in Ireland. He submitted that this would be unfair and unjust. If unfitted for service by mental affliction the Military Estimates ought to bear the cost. Reason and analogy were in favour of the adoption by the Committee of that principle. He suggested that the Proviso standing in the name of the hon. Member for Meath should be added to the Amendment of the Secretary of State for War, which, he thought, should then be accepted without further comment.

MR. RYLANDS thought the words as they stood would cause injustice towards towns where there were depôt centres. Without being able to suggest what would exactly meet his view of the matter, he thought it would be only reasonable that some means should be adopted to prevent injustice upon parishes.

MR. PARNELL said, the Amendment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman appeared to him to upset the whole of the existing law. If the proviso as to the cost being defrayed by the War Office were added, the soldier would not become a pauper, but would simply remain a lunatic in his regiment; and if even the law with regard to removability were altered, and it was declared that he should be entitled to relief, the soldier would not be a pauper.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, there were no powers now in existence for the removal of soldiers. The removal would be to the place to which by law for the time being the person might be removed. The attestation paper would give no power of removal.

MR. HIBBERT thought the word "removable" objectionable, and moved that the word "chargeable" be substituted.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HIBBERT pointed out that a soldier in Her Majesty's Service was not a pauper, and could not, therefore, become chargeable unless he was destitute. He moved the addition of the words "if he were destitute" at the end of the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 47, line 40, after the word "parish," to insert the words "or union." Also, in page 48, line 5, after "parish," to insert "or union."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. PARNELL said, there was considerable force in the remark of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), that a lunatic soldier should betaken back to his native county, where his friends were, when he would probably be amongst friends; but there was no reason why the revenues of that county should be charged with the expense of his maintenance. It had, in the case of an officer, always been the rule of the Service that if he became insane some allowance should be made to him. Why, then, should not this rule apply in the case of a soldier who became insane in the Service, perhaps from the effect of climate? It would only be fair to take the cost of his maintenance off the rates; and, therefore, he begged to move that words be added at the end of the clause to the effect that the guardians of the poor of the union or parish upon which the cost of maintaining such lunatic, or his wife, or child, devolved should be entitled to receive from the War Office the cost so incurred from time to time for the support of such person or persons.

Amendment proposed,

In page 48, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That the guardians of the poor of the union or parish upon which the cost of maintaining such lunatic or his wife or child devolves, shall be entitled to receive from the War Office the cost so incurred from time to time for the support of such person or persons."
—(Mr. Parnell.)

COLONEL STANLEY said, the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was at first sight entitled to a good deal of consideration; but he was bound to point out that the circumstances of the case were hardly such as some hon. Members appeared to have in their minds. The Government would have no difficulty in agreeing that the Estimates should be charged with the cost of a man who had incurred illness, or suffered from the effects of climate whilst in the service of the State; but he did not think it would be reasonable that this should be the case where insanity had developed itself in a man who had served but a short time in the ranks. With regard to the mass of these cases, however, a very considerable portion of the cost was already paid by Government under their arrangements in connection with local authorities. For these reasons, and inasmuch as the proposition required a good deal of consideration and working out, and would, moreover, create a large charge upon the Military Estimates, although, of course, the latter was not a chief point of objection, he did not feel able to assent to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to amend the proposed Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) in a manner that he believed would meet the objection which had been raised by the Secretary of State for War to charging the Estimates with the cost of persons who became insane within the first three years of their service. He, therefore, moved to add to the proposed Amendment the words "provided that the soldier shall have been more than three years in the Service."

MR. BRISTOWE could not help thinking that the hon. Member for Meath should re-consider his Amendment, which proposed that the wife and children of a lunatic, however short might be the period of his service, should be chargeable on the State. He could understand that when an insane person had been not less than three years in the Service the State should be chargeable; but he could not see upon what principle the wife and children should be so charged.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) ought, in his opinion, to be accepted.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN maintained that soldiers who had broken down in the Service, and become lunatics, ought not to be spoken of in the sense of paupers, and thought that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway had removed every objection to the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had objected to the latter Amendment—that we had only three years' service; but how long did he suppose that the system of short service in the Army was likely to last? He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) believed that everyone connected with the Army had discovered that, from a military point of view, short service was a failure. They ought not at least to regard the soldier as a pauper, and if his lunacy were induced by service in hot climates, the House, he thought, should not place his cost upon the rates of a particular district, but upon the Consolidated Fund.

MR. RAMSAY said, the authorities had ample opportunities of examining a person before enlistment in order to ascertain the exact state of his health; and he understood that if there was any indication to the medical man who made the examination that the recruit was likely to become shortly insane he would not be accepted by the authorities. Now, if that were correct, he could not see upon what ground they were called upon to have a lunatic soldier chargeable upon the rates. No one could say in what way the insanity of an individual was produced; and, therefore, if it were equitable, as he felt it to be, that the State should maintain a soldier who became insane during his period of service it should be quite irrespective of the time during which he had served. If, as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated, a portion of the cost of pauper lunatics was now borne by the State, it was an additional reason why the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath should be accepted, because it would not make the burden so heavy as was at first supposed. He could not, however, agree to that part of the Amendment relating to the wife and child of a lunatic soldier. It would be inequitable to charge their maintenance upon the State; and, therefore, he thought the words relating to them should be struck out if the Amendment were accepted.

MR. PARNELL pointed out to the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) that there was very much more reason why the wife and child should be supported at the expense of the State than there was for the soldier himself being so supported. The wife of a soldier who had been permitted to marry would be on the strength of the regiment. It was well known that soldiers were only permitted to marry when on long service, or for some particular and special reason, and that the wives of such soldiers accompanying the regiment were on the strength of the regiment. Take the case of the wife of a soldier born in a different place from that in which her husband had a settlement; if the words of his Amendment relating to the wife and child were struck out it would come to this—that where a soldier who became lunatic had married with the leave of the colonel, because the wife's services would be useful about the regiment, his wife and child would be sent back to the place where the soldier was chargeable, and become chargeable on the rates there although she had had nothing to do with the place. It was true that the cost would not add much to the rates; but he wondered that the Government did not agree to its being borne by the State.

MR. CALLAN hoped that the Amendment would be agreed to. It was intended to meet such a case as had occurred within his own knowledge, and in the borough which he represented. He referred to the case of a man stationed in one of the towns of Lancashire, who became insane, and was sent in custody of three soldiers to Dundalk; he was left at the workhouse there without any order from the parochial authorities. He (Mr. Callan), happening to be at the workhouse on the day following the man's arrival, recommended that the War Office should be communicated with, and, after the lapse of months, information was received that the man was entitled to the sum of £5 as deferred pay. It was also found that the man, although the son of an Irish soldier, had been born in England, and had never been in Ireland. According to law, the people of Dundalk had no remedy, and the ratepayers had been obliged to support the man ever since he was sent there. He trusted that the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath, which would provide a remedy in such cases, would be agreed to by the Committee.

Amendment proposed to proposed Amendment, by adding the words, "Provided that the soldier shall have been more than three years in the service."

Amendment agreed to.

O

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 64; Noes 193: Majority 129.—(Div. List, No. 163.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 128 (Provision in case of insane persons).

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 68, line 28, to leave out "insane," and insert—

"By reason of insanity unfit to take his trial, the Court shall find specially that fact, and such person shall be kept in custody in the prescribed manner until the directions of Her Majesty thereon are known, or until any earlier time at which such person is fit to take his trial.

"Where on the trial by court martial of a person charged with an offence it appears that such person committed the offence but that he was insane at the time of commission thereof."

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 68, line 31, after "and," to insert the words "in either of the above cases."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. PARNELL moved, in page 68, line 41, to leave out the word "may," and insert the word "shall."

Amendment negatived.

MR. PARNELL said, that when prisoners became insane in prison it was evident that their imprisonment had been too much for their minds. It was a horrible thing that a man, who was certified to be again of sound mind, should be sent back to prison to become again insane. A man's mind must be more or less permanently affected by the fact of his having been insane. He, therefore, moved to leave out in page 69, line 5, all the words after "imprisonment" to the end of the clause. He would like to know whether the provisions of this section would apply to convict establishments, or only to prisons? It was his impression that it referred only to prisons.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he could not give an answer then, but would look into the matter.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 69, line 7, to leave out all the words after the word "prison."

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 40, to leave out the postponed Clause 72, in order to insert the following clause:—

(Provost marshal.)

"For the prompt repression of all irregularities and crimes which may be committed abroad, provost marshals, with assistants, may from time to time be appointed by the general order of the general officer commanding a body of forces.

"A provost marshal or his assistants may at any time arrest and detain for trial persons subject to military law committing offences, and may also carry into execution any punishments to be inflicted in pursuance of a court martial, but shall not inflict any punishment of his or their own authority.

"A provost marshal, attached to any forces on active service, or any of his assistants, may make a complaint to any officer in immediate command of any detachment or portion of such body of forces, against any person subject to military law who has committed any offence; and if in the opinion of such officer, it is not practicable, having due regard to the public service, that such offence should be tried by an ordinary court martial, it shall be lawful for him (although not authorised to convene a general court martial) to convene a field general court martial, and such court may try summarily the person so charged, and award punishment for his offence, and the sentence of the court shall be valid, and may be carried into effect if a sentence of capital punishment, when confirmed by the general or field officer commanding the force of which such detachment or portion forms part, and if not capital when confirmed by any general or field officer in such force."

He wished to explain, with regard to this clause, that, attention having been called to the very large powers given to the provost marshal, the Government had considered the whole subject very carefully. They proposed, therefore, to substitute for the original Clause 72 the new clause, which he now moved. It would be observed that the clause gave full power, first of all, to a general commanding a body of forces to appoint provost marshals, and the provost marshals were then given power to arrest and detain persons subject to military law. The clause did not give the provost marshal power of his own discretion to exercise punishment; he was only made an executive officer acting under authority. With regard to the punishments provided by the Act, the provost marshal, while upon active service, had the power to appeal to a court to be called summarily, and to that court was given the power to inflict the punishments which now could be inflicted by the sole power of the provost marshal. The remainder of the clause would explain itself, and he hoped that the Committee would allow it to be passed in the form in which it now stood.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that in the absence of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) he would propose the Amendments which stood in his name. He, therefore, moved, in line 1 of the proposed new clause, to leave out "all irregularities," in order to insert "offences."

Amendment agreed to.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he had now to propose, in line 2, after the word "abroad," to insert "on active service."

COLONEL STANLEY said, that this alteration went further than he thought was right. The provost marshal was, practically, a sort of police officer, whose duty it was to superintend the police of the camp. It would be very undesirable that the powers of the provost marshal should be limited to active service; although, as would be seen, it was only while on active service that they could bring persons before a summary court martial.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL remarked, that he was of the same opinion as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. Without the aid of the provost marshal, there would be no proper means of bringing a prisoner to justice.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE thought that, while not on active service, the military police would have been quite sufficient.

Amendment negatived.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not intend to move the next Amendment which stood in the name of his hon. and learned Friend. He would, however, move the following Amendment, which was in line 7:—After the word "punishments," to insert "authorized by this Act." He did not know that the words were absolutely necessary; but he thought they made the matter somewhat clearer.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN thought that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War ought to tell the Committee why he would not agree to this Amendment.

COLONEL STANLEY observed, that punishment not authorized by the Act could not be inflicted.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the next Amendment he proposed to move was in line 7, to leave out "in pursuance," in order to insert "by sentence." It was not good English to say that a provost marshal was to carry into execution "any punishments to be inflicted in pursuance of a court martial."

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the reason the words were used was to clear up any ambiguity which would arise from saying that punishments were to be inflicted by sentence of court martial. Those words would have left it doubtful as to the confirmation of the sentence; but no doubt remained by using the expression "in pursuance of."

Amendment negatived.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT moved, in line 8 of the proposed new clause, after the word "authority," to insert "on any soldier." The object of this Amendment was to make not the soldiers, but the camp followers, subject to the jurisdiction of the provost marshal. He was quite sure that anyone who had served either in India, or in any campaign in which soldiers from India had been engaged, would bear him out in the statement that it would be absolutely impossible to try every camp follower by field general court martial who happened to commit any offence. He did not know how military operations could be conducted if this were to go on. He had no wish to press hardly upon camp followers; and he would be perfectly satisfied if an undertaking were given that some order should be introduced into the regulations by which two officers should be appointed to attend the provost marshal in camp at a certain hour, and share with him the responsibility of inflicting punishment upon the camp followers. If either a regimental court martial or a field general court martial had to be summoned to try camp followers, the whole time of officers would be occupied in trying persons who were not in the Army. He felt very strongly against permitting any abuse of power by a provost marshal; but he thought there could be no objection to the proposal he had made. By camp followers he did not mean soldiers; but those who were employed as servants to the troops.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that by the 167th clause of the Bill camp followers had been for the first time made subject to military law. What the hon. and gallant Member now proposed to do was not only to subject those persons to military law, but, at the same time, to allow the provost marshal and his assistants to inflict upon them any punishments they chose. If the hon. and gallant Member had thought there was any difficulty in trying such persons, he should have objected to their being made subject to military law.

COLONEL MURE wished to point out that the Bill contained no definition of a camp follower. Many men who followed a camp could not be placed under the provisions of this Act.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that his hon. and gallant Friend seemed to think that there would be some difficulty in determining what camp followers were, and that persons might be placed under military law improperly. He hoped that that would not be so. He thought that they had already determined what civilians should be subject to military law. It was proposed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Arbuthnot) that soldiers should be tried in one way and civilians in another. He did not think that civilians ought to be left entirely at the mercy of the provost marshal.

GENERAL SHUTE hoped that his hon. and gallant Friend would withdraw his Amendment. He recognized the difficulty which he proposed to meet, which was one that any officer who had served in India could well understand. But he did not think that it was advisable to put such large powers in the hands of the provost marshal.

MAJOR NOLAN did not think that there would be any difficulty in carrying out the Amendment. He had seen some batteries where the camp followers were beaten by order of the commanding officer, and others where the commanding officer called together three officers to give an opinion on the subject. It would have a much better effect if these punishments were inflicted by order of three officers than if they were directed by one.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT would not press his Amendment to a Division, if the opinion of the Committee was against him. He was quite sure that there could be but one opinion outside the House amongst those who had served in India, that it would be impossible to summon a court martial to try every camp follower.

COLONEL MURE said, that this clause gave a right to place persons following a camp under military law. It did not specify how near the camp persons must get to bring themselves under the Act, or if there was any radius within which they were liable. He might point out that, by the 11th section of the 167th clause, camp followers were defined to be persons who were allowed to be so. It might be provided that persons should be forbidden to come into the camp.

Amendment negatived.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he should not move the Amendment of which he had given Notice—namely, to leave out “having due regard to the public service,” if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would explain what the words meant.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he was advised to leave the words in the clause, in order to make it clear what circumstances should justify an officer in considering that it was not practicable to summon an ordinary court martial. “Having due regard to the public service” meant that an officer was to consider whether the Public Service would suffer by delay caused by summoning an ordinary court martial. He was not to run the risk which would be caused by delay to the Public Service.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that if these words were left in the clause there would be eight or ten times as many courts martial than if they were struck out. These summary courts martial would always be held whenever there was the least inconvenience in holding an ordinary court martial; the whole matter depended very much upon what a field general court martial was. He did not suppose that any officer there knew exactly what such a court martial was; that was not surprising, for they had not been in use for 50 years. A field general court martial was utterly opposed to any custom or to any rule which governed an ordinary court martial; it was totally irregular, and conducted in quite a different manner from an ordinary general court martial. It was for that reason that he did not wish the Committee to sanction a field general court martial, if any other court martial could be held. A field general court martial possessed the power of capital punishment, as well as the power of flogging. In his opinion, its sentences ought never to be put in execution until approved of by the Commander-in-Chief of the whole Army, because it was so totally irregular and informal. Formerly, a field general court martial was restricted to trying offences committed against the inhabitants of the country; it was held on the spot by any three officers, and was presided over by the officer who convened it. Such a court could be convened by any officer, if he could get the attendance of two other officers of any rank—perhaps subalterns—and it had power to sentence any man to death. The old rule was that no sentence should be carried into effect until the General commanding-in-chief had sanctioned it, so extra-judicial and summary was the court. He believed that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would propose two Amendments, which would considerably mitigate it. But the court was so irregular that it ought not to be held when it was possible to hold an ordinary general court martial. He was strongly of opinion that a field general court martial should only be held in very extraordinary cases. By leaving out the words “having due regard to the public service,” they would prevent the court being used when it was possible to hold an ordinary general court martial.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the Government to consider favourably the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan). In Clause 49, a field general court martial was empowered to try offences against the property and person of any inhabitant or resident in any country beyond the seas. An entirely new jurisdiction was now given to this court, and the court of the provost marshal was practically drawn upon the lines of a field general court martial defined in Clause 49. A field general court martial was to be held, under Clause 49, whenever, in the opinion of the officer commanding a detachment, it was not practicable that an offence should be tried by an ordinary general court martial. There were no words in that clause as to having due regard to the public service. He thought that it should be expressly provided that a field general court martial was not to be resorted to, except it was not practicable to convene a general court martial. If these words, “having due regard to the public service,” were not necessary in Clause 49, they were not necessary in that clause.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that they might have many cases of petty offences committed by camp followers which it was necessary to deal with summarily. They had taken away the power of the provost marshal to deal with these cases himself, and had substituted a field general court martial. It seemed to him that if these words were struck out it would be necessary, if not absolutely impracticable, to bring together a general court martial of seven officers, in order to try these petty offences. The acceptance of the Amendment would make it necessary that a regular court martial should be summoned whenever practicable, although at the greatest inconvenience to the Public Service.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway would bring this clause into harmony with Clause 49. As had been pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), it would be extremely inconvenient to have the words “having due regard to the public service” in the one clause, and not in the other. For those reasons, he was disposed to agree with the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member.

Amendment agreed to.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he had to move, in line 18 of the clause, to insert, after “confirmed by,” “the general or field officer commanding the force, and if not capital, when confirmed by.” His suggestion was that sentences should be confirmed by a general officer; but if a general officer were not near, then by a field officer, in all cases of punishments not capital—such as flogging. He preferred to put the responsibility upon the general officer when he was near, and upon the field officer when a general officer could not be reached. He did not object to a field officer having the power to confirm a sentence when a general was absent; but he thought that when both were present then the general should have the responsibility.

COLONEL STANLEY pointed out that there was a great difficulty in defining the exact circumstances under which this was to apply.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had put down two separate Amendments to follow on here, but the first was no longer applicable; and as to the second, if he was informed that there was any means by which the records of courts martial should be kept, that would be sufficient. He did not think, however, it was provided in any other part of the Bill; and, therefore, he wished to move this Amendment. His great objection to the provost marshal was mainly based on the fact that no record was kept of his proceedings. Therefore, in order to see what the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would say, he would move to add, at the end of the clause—

"And records of such field general courts martial shall be kept as provided in this Act for garrison courts martial."

COLONEL STANLEY said, he would agree to the Amendment if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would leave out the word "garrison," and insert instead the word "district." There were now no garrison courts martial.

MAJOR NOLAN accepted the Amendment, and moved to add the following words:—

"And records of field general courts martial shall be kept for the said time provided in this Act for district courts martial."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought the Amendment might be very inconvenient, as for mere petty offences they would be obliged to keep the same exact record of everything connected with the trial as though they were district courts martial.

COLONEL STANLEY explained, that it was only the records which would be kept.

Amendment agreed to.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, be added to the Bill?"

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL heartily supported the new clause which had been substituted for Clause 72, and which was entirely in accordance with his own views. He entirely approved the substitution of very summary court martial for the provost marshal; but he was a little apprehensive lest in taking away the powers of the courts martial they should never provide for the case of a summary detachment acting apart from the Regular Army. Offences against the inhabitants of the country were most likely to arise; in such cases where three officers would not be available for the court martial, or a field officer be ready to confirm it. It was with that view that he ventured to submit this addition to the clause—

"If three officers cannot be assembled for such trial the field court martial convened for summary trial under this section may consist of two officers, or, if there be only one officer with a detachment of troops, that officer may also exercise the powers of a field court martial as above. If there be no provost marshal with a detachment of troops on active service the officer in command may order any person to be tried in the same way as if complaint had been made by a provost marshal. If there be no field officer present with the detachment the officer in immediate command may confirm the sentence, subject to revision at any time by the general officer in command."

The practical effect would be to give one or two officers in the field the powers summarily exercised by a police magistrate in regard to petty offences. He had expressly exempted the punishments of death and long terms of imprisonment, which were to be subject to the revision of the officer in command.

MAJOR NOLAN thought the Amendment scarcely applicable to the case of civilized warfare, for there they could not imagine a case where they would not be able to get one officer; while, in the case of need, the proper remedy would be to give Native officers the power to sit on a court martial. Besides, what was the use of the provision? It did not contain sentence of death, and in cases of sentence of imprisonment, what was the good if a man must remain a prisoner until his sentence was confirmed? If it had been a case of flogging he could have understood it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT pointed out that another objection was that the proposal was inconsistent with Clause 49, which was intended to deal with the cases of offences against the persons of inhabitants of the country. This clause proposed to deal in a totally different manner with an offence which was already dealt with under that clause.

Mr. ELLIOT objected to the powers given in the last three lines by which the officer in immediate command of a detachment might confirm a sentence. Such a power as that seemed to him to be absurd.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the same objection had occurred to him; but, apart from that, he did not believe that they would be able to carry this clause practically into effect. He hoped the Committee would accept the clause as it stood.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL would not press his Amendment if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could not accept it; but still it seemed to him impossible that this clause and Clause 49 could stand together. Clause 72 was a general clause applying to all offences; and, consequently, any offence being a military offence would be tried by court martial, confirmed by any field officer, and carried into immediate execution, whereas the special provisions made in Clause 49 gave a far less summary process.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. SULLIVAN wished cordially and most heartily to congratulate the Secretary of State for War, and the Committee, on the reformation accomplished by this clause. In the years to come the serious change of getting rid of the provost marshal would be one of the reasons which would justify the conduct of Members of that House who had made such efforts to amend the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 103, after Clause 177, to insert the following Clause:—

(Power of Her Majesty to make Articles of War.)

"It shall be lawful for Her Majesty to make articles of war for the better government of officers and soldiers, and such articles shall be judicially taken notice of by all judges and in all courts whatsoever: Provided, That no person shall, by such articles of war, be subject to suffer any punishment extending to life or limb, or to be kept in penal servitude, except for crimes which are by this Act expressly made liable to such punishment as aforesaid, or be subject, with reference to any crimes made punishable by this Act, to be punished in any manner which does not accord with the provisions of this Act."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked whether it was necessary to insert this clause? It certainly was put in a very moderate form, and greatly modified as compared with the clause originally introduced; but, for his part, he could not see any necessity for it at all. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) said it was a great point gained, when the Articles of War were put into the Bill; and, therefore, he could not understand why those powers should be preserved.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, one of the earliest points considered by the Committee, and one on which they certainly came very early to a conclusion, was, that this matter could not be corrected unless the Articles of War were consolidated with the Act. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief assented to that general proposition. He pointed out that there might be some difficulty in cases, if there were no power whatever of issuing an Article of War to meet some unforeseen case or sudden emergency. No harm could come of this proposal, because, if any Article of War were ever issued which did not meet the approval of Parliament, it could be dealt with every year when the Mutiny Act was under consideration. The old law gave the Crown unlimited powers to make Articles of War of any kind, dealing with any offence, and giving any punishments. Then that power was limited, so as not to be inconsistent with the Mutiny Bill, but it only applied throughout the British Islands; while, in this Bill, that rule was to apply everywhere. He could not conceive a greater concession than that. As the clause stood, they had dealt with almost every question which could be dealt with in an Article of War, and no Article could be issued inconsistent with this Bill, nor any Act nor Article of War be issued dealing with a matter with which the present Articles of War dealt, because they were incorporated with the Bill. Therefore, these could only be issued for some unforeseen contingency or some necessity in the Army which required immediate remedy. Even then, if Parliament did not approve of the Article, there would be an opportunity, every year, of taking its opinion upon it.

MR. E. JENKINS was of opinion that the hon. and learned Gentleman had fallen into a slight error, for the clause did not say that no Article of War should be made which was inconsistent with the Act. It simply said that no punishment should be given in a manner which did not accord with the provisions of the Act, which was not, of course, quite so wide. Of course, the question simply was, in consideration of the fact that the Articles of War had not been altered for 50 years, that these Articles were now embodied, with many changes, in this Bill, and that they constituted a Military Code, whether the Crown should be left with any power in any way to change the general provisions of this Act? Although this clause had evidently been drawn with some care for the purpose of, as far as possible, avoiding interfering with that Parliamentary supervision which had been assumed during the course of the discussion on this Bill, it was a question whether it would not be better that alterations should be made in the latter part of the clause, so as really to confirm the action of the Crown under such administrative regulations as might be found necessary for the better discipline of the Army. If some such idea as that were worked into the clause he thought it would be desirable.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, if the Government were willing to carry out the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford, they might do it in a much simpler manner than that suggested, by adding, after the word "soldiers," "not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act." It would then still be within the power of Her Majesty to make such new clauses as might be found necessary, provided they did not conflict with the present Act. He thought that was a change of some considerable importance; because, without that limitation, it would be possible to entirely alter the constitution of courts martial, which had been settled, after considerable discussion, by that House.

MAJOR NOLAN observed, that the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) made him think that some great concession was to be contained in the new Act; whereas the old Act comprehended all this, with the only difference that it extended to Great Britain and Ireland only. Practically, however, they had exactly the same thing in Gibraltar and Malta. This was evidently the same as Clause 1 of the old Act, and was, indeed, word for word the same. He always understood the great advantage of this Bill was that there would be no Articles of War for the future, and that was always pointed to as a great concession; yet now they found that the Articles of War were to be enacted exactly as before, with the exception, which he did not consider of any practical value, that the Bill was to run everywhere, instead of being confined to Great Britain and Ireland.

MR. PARNELL moved, in line 2 of the new clause, after the word "soldiers," to insert the words "not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act." He hoped the Government would accede to the alteration.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) replied, that it would be impossible to make such a change consistently with the Act. He would, therefore, prefer to keep the clause in the same shape as that in which it had been read a second time.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN inquired why it would be impossible for the Crown to make Articles of War if some of the provisions were inserted in the Bill?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, that the Crown made Articles of War by the exercise of its Prerogative. The Prerogative could not be used if the subject-matter were dealt with by Statute.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked why the Government had then inserted the Proviso that no person should be subject to suffer any punishment under the Articles of War except for crimes made punishable by the Act?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that that arose from the form of the old Mutiny Act. A power unlimited, in the first instance, was given by the old Mutiny Bill; it was afterwards limited to the United Kingdom. The exercise of the power of the provost marshal depended upon that limitation. That clause would be illegal in England, because it created crimes and punishments not consistent with the Mutiny Bill. The Proviso with reference to the United Kingdom had always been understood by lawyers as preventing the Crown from making the Articles of War inconsistent with the Mutiny Bill so far as the United Kingdom was concerned. If they struck out the words "United Kingdom" it would prevent Articles of War inconsistent with the Mutiny Bill being framed for use outside the United Kingdom. All legal opinions had been founded upon the doctrine that if legislation were made clearly with reference to a certain matter, then a Proviso, by the fact of that legislation, was extinct. The Mutiny Bill only applied to England originally, and required special legislation to apply it to Ireland. So long as the Act did not apply, the Prerogative of the Crown was unlimited; but where a Statute was passed it remained as limited by the Statute. Wherever a Statute applied to a subject-matter and limited the Prerogative, then the Prerogative was to that extent extinguished. What he had stated was, he believed, the true state of the law; and, therefore, if a Statute said that a court martial should consist of seven men it could not legally consist of any other number. He thought that they had better stick, so far as they could, to the language of the old Articles of War, and strike out the limitation of the United Kingdom.

Amendment agreed to; Clause inserted accordingly.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN proposed, in line 5 of the proposed new clause, to leave out the words "extending to life or limb, or to be kept in penal servitude." He did not see any reason to limit the Proviso preventing persons from suffering punishment except for crimes expressly made liable by the Act to such punishments to those punishments only which extended to life, or limb, or penal servitude. He did not see why other punishments, such as imprisonment, should be permitted to be inflicted under the Articles of War for crimes which were not expressly made liable to such punishments by the Act.

Amendment proposed,

In line 5 of the proposed new Clause, to leave out the words "extending to life or limb, or to be kept in penal servitude."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed new Clause."

COLONEL STANLEY could not consent to the omission of these words. The expression was placed in the original Bill from the old Act; but, of course, that was no particular argument one way or the other. But the words had been carefully considered, and those who had had large experience were in favour of their retention. Nothing should be done to make the Articles of War inconsistent with the Bill; but he did not think it would be wise to omit these words.

MR. RYLANDS hoped that the Government would re-consider their decision upon this point. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had fallen back upon the words being in the old Act; but he did think that at the time these words were used in the Mutiny Act there was an intention to reserve to the Crown a power of deciding upon the punishment of the crimes other than those affecting life or limb, or extending to penal servitude. It was the clear intention of the present Bill to do away with the power of the Crown to impose any punishment except according to the provisions of that Act. The statements of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, and of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, clearly proved that there was no intention under the Articles of War to impose any punishment not laid down in the Act. It would be most unfortunate that if, after they had gone through the Bill and formulated the whole Military Law, there should be a clause leaving the Crown the liberty of determining what punishments should be inflicted for crimes not specified in the Act, supposing they did not extend to life or limb. He thought that the Government should accept the Amendment.

MR. SULLIVAN remarked, that he was not a military man; but he knew sufficient to see how serious a thing it would be if the Crown were to be at liberty to create these new crimes and punishments. He trusted that the better judgment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, when he had had a few moments to reflect, would induce him to agree to the Amendment. Let them imagine how the clause would read—

"Provided, That no person shall, by such articles of war, be subject to suffer any punishment extending to life or limb, or to be kept in penal servitude;"

but that as to all other punishments the Crown could decide. Either this clause went too far, or it stopped short too soon. He would respectfully urge upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that this clause either went too far, or else it did not go far enough.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would agree to strike these words from the clause. By so doing they would bring the power to make Articles of War more entirely in accord with the Act than at present. It was obviously the intention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman himself to do that.

COLONEL MURE observed, that if there was a meaning in English, the clause must signify that, except as to punishments extending to life or limb or penal servitude, the Articles of War had power to legislate. The Articles of War were to provide for certain cases not provided for in the Act; but, practically speaking, they had no power to inflict punishments except under the Act.

COLONEL ALEXANDER did not think it possible that any new crime could be created by the new Articles of War. It seemed to him that every offence that could possibly be committed by man, either on active service or at home, had been put in the Bill. He did not think that in any Articles of War that might be framed within the next 50 years it would be necessary to provide for any new offences.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked for what, then, were the Articles of War required? The hon. and learned Member for Oxford had told them that in 1813 the Duke of Wellington proposed that Articles of War should be issued for certain purposes. Many things had been provided for by those Articles which did not exist at the present time, and the present Bill had been made so complete that there was no reason to have any Articles of War.

MR. E. JENKINS said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had told them that it was necessary to have a power for the Crown to make new Articles of War creating new crimes which did not extend to life, or limb, or penal servitude. They therefore knew what the Government was endeavouring to do.

MR. A. H. BROWN said, that the Amendment, to be consistent, should be to leave out all the words after "articles of war" in line 4, to "or" in line 7. The clause would then run—

"Provided, That no person shall, by such articles of war, be subject with reference to any crimes made punishable by this Act to be punished in any manner which does not accord with the provisions of this Act."

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 52: Majority 43. — (Div. List, No. 164.)

MR. E. JENKINS stated, that he did not intend to move the four clauses standing in his name, because, in the first place, a Committee had been appointed to examine into the condition and organization of the Army; and, secondly, because he did not think they could have such a discussion on it as would do justice to the subject at that moment.

Clauses, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL moved, in page 11, after Clause 28, to insert the following clause:—

(Rules of Evidence.)

"The rules of evidence to be adopted in proceedings before courts martial shall be the same as those which are followed in civil courts; and no person shall be required to answer any question or to produce any document which he could not be required to answer or produce in similar proceedings before a civil court."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. E. JENKINS moved to report Progress. The clauses which he wished to move would come on almost immediately; and the Committee, he thought, had already done sufficient work for the night.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER did not imagine, on the other hand, that it was necessary to move these clauses exactly in their place in the Bill. It would be convenient for them to go on with the other Amendments, and to leave this to come later.

THE CHAIRMAN: I beg to point out to the Committee that the practice of the Committee has always been to take the clauses as they stand on the Paper. The hon. Member just now stated that he had certain clauses which he wished to withdraw; and though they were not immediately in Order, with the consent of the Committee they were allowed to be withdrawn. Still, he will have no right to insist on overriding those clauses which stand before him.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL moved, in page 16, after Clause 40, to insert the following clause:—

(Trial for offence to take place within three months of commission.)

"No person subject to military law shall be tried for an offence against the preceding clause after an interval of three months has elapsed from the commission of such offence."

COLONEL STANLEY hardly thought the clause would do as it stood. [Mr. PARNELL referred to Clause 40.] He (Colonel Stanley) was afraid the same objection would obtain there. It would be exceptional, of course; but it would not do to lay down a hard-and-fast line.

COLONEL MURE thought it would be a premium for committing offences under Clause 40.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman could not have read that clause. That clause was to apply to the following offences:—

"Guilty of any act, conduct, disorder, or neglect, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, though not in the Act otherwise specified."

It would puzzle any soldier to be guilty of an offence not otherwise specified in the Act.

MR. PARNELL said, surely an offence not dealt with somewhere in that Act would not be likely to be found out. In the first place, the offence must be of so indefinite a character that the soldier would have great difficulty in knowing about it. If it was so extraordinary, it could not be so difficult to discover and punish any long time after it was discovered. He thought the Secretary of State for War might give way under the circumstances. It was really too late to argue the matter.

Amendment negatived.

MR. PARNELL rose to move, after Clause 41, to insert the following clause:—

(Trial for certain offences to be before civil court.)

"Where practicable every person subject to military law who commits any of the offences mentioned in Schedule of this Bill shall be proceeded against before a civil court of competent jurisdiction, and, on conviction, shall be punished in accordance with the provisions of the statute or statutes dealing with such offence."

THE CHAIRMAN: This new clause, I think, cannot be introduced; for Clause 41 having been adopted as it stands, I think it is inadmissible to move this new clause, because it conflicts with Clause 41.

MR. PARNELL asked a question of the Chairman, sitting with his hat on. ["Order, order!"]

MR. PARNELL, rising: I was perfectly in Order. The Chairman was standing, and therefore I was quite in Order in addressing him from my seat with my hat on.

COLONEL MURE: May I ask you, Sir, for your direction on that point?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not in Order to address the Chair sitting, with his hat on, except during a Division, or when he speaks on a matter relating simply to the calling of a Division.

MR. PARNELL said, he would move the Amendment on the Report.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK moved, in page 18, after Clause 43, to insert the following clause:—

"Every officer who shall be accused of any military offence under this Act, and whose conduct in that respect shall have been investigated by a court of inquiry, shall be entitled, if he demands it, to receive a copy in writing of the opinion of such court of inquiry, or of the opinion formed by the officer who assembled that court, upon the evidence adduced before it."

"And if the accused officer challenge such opinion he shall not be liable to be removed from his appointment, or to be placed upon half-pay, without being first afforded the opportunity of refuting the charges made against him, in open trial, before a general court martial: Provided always, That nothing hereinbefore contained shall affect the undoubted prerogative of Her Majesty to remove any officer from the Army, or to place him upon half-pay, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of State for War made upon his official responsibility."

This clause was one of considerable importance; but he did not desire to delay the progress of the Bill, nor to debate the point at any length. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in the Paper issued that day, had in substance conceded the first part of his clause; and as to the second part, he should be glad to know whether the right hon. Gentleman could not accept it? It proposed to give an officer the right of appeal against the opinion of any court martial, and that was no greater concession than the concession already made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. Indeed, the Secretary of State for the Home Department went so far as to say that no court martial should inquire into offences which could properly be tried by a court martial. His clause embodied that, and nothing more. If the Government would but admit that an accused person should have the right, if he challenged the accusation, of having his case dealt with by court martial, there was nothing more than that in his Amendment.

COLONEL STANLEY was sorry that he could not assent to the second part. The first was already disposed of by the regulations he had issued that day. The hon. and gallant Gentleman must recollect that in the previous debate he expressly guarded himself against going as far as this, although he agreed that a Court of Inquiry should not take upon itself the functions of a court martial. He did not at all admit the premiss from which the second part of the clause was deduced, that a court martial could in any way affect proceedings against an officer's character; it could only assist a commanding officer to come to a conclusion. He particularly did not want to constitute a Court of Inquiry, and the principle he wished to uphold was, when a commanding officer was the responsible person, he wanted to make the person who acted upon this report distinctly responsible, and that his rules went to that point. Practically, this inquiry would put the officer in the same position he would have occupied if he had been brought before his commanding officer. They knew that confidential reports always followed the inspection of a regiment, giving an account—a very fair account, he believed—of the conduct and character of the officers, for the guidance of their superiors. A very good rule had now been made that, whenever an officer had anything reported against him, he should be made acquainted with it at the time, so that he might have an opportunity to look to it, and see that he behaved better in future. The same thing had been provided with regard to a Court of Inquiry. If they reported facts which, in the opinion of the officer, did not justify a trial by court martial, but yet told against the officer, he was made acquainted with the report, which was to put him in as good a position as he could desire. He could not quite understand how his hon. and gallant Friend was to reckon out the latter part of his Amendment. He gave an officer the statutory right to a court martial; but the officer might have committed no offence, and yet might have been employed in some office or work for which he was manifestly unfit. Surely they were not going to give this officer the right to remain in that office, subject only to dismissal by court martial. He really did not see how the two parts of the last part of the clause could work together, because, undoubtedly, the Prerogative of the Crown was still to be left. He hoped, therefore, the Amendment would not be pressed.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK replied, that the Secretary of State for War had taken up a position which forced him to repeat over and over again arguments which he thought had long since been done with. The discrepancy pointed out, and which appeared to exist, did not exist in fact; and he had provided for both points exactly as in the Amendment which he moved on the 1st of May. He did not desire in the slightest degree to restrict the Prerogative of the Crown; but, on the other hand, he wished that the officer should have the right which had been given to the private soldier to such an extent that he could not even be mulcted of a day's pay without a court martial, if he chose. What he desired to claim for the individual officer was that when it was alleged that he was guilty of any offence under this Act, he should be allowed the privilege that attached of right to every civilian—and which, he maintained, a man did not lose by joining the Army—of being tried openly by his peers. At present, an allegation might be made against an officer that he had been deficient in some respect, or had committed some military offence, and that was submitted to the investigation of a court martial. He thought they had already come to a conclusion that courts martial should never be substituted for Courts of Inquiry; that they should never be the final inquiry, and that an officer should not be liable to be dismissed, or placed on half-pay, without being able first to prove his innocence before a court martial. His clause really did not interfere with the Prerogative, for it still would be open for Her Majesty, on the advice of Her responsible officers, if she thought fit, even where an officer had been tried and acquitted, to quietly say she dismissed him from the Service. The difference was that, in one case, a man was sent into civil life with a stigma on his name; while, in the other case, he could, at least, point to the decision of a court martial as a proof that, so far as that was concerned, he had been able to rebut the charge against him. The two divisions of this clause did not clash or conflict in the slightest degree. The charge made was that, while the Prerogative of the Crown still remained to dismiss an officer at any time without reason alleged, it did not extend to the dismissal of an officer after, and in consequence of, the decision of a court martial, until he had been first given the opportunity of rebutting the charge against him before a court martial.

Amendment negatived.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

ARTIZANS' DWELLINGS ACT (1868)
EXTENSION (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. W. M. Torrens, Sir Thomas Chambers, Mr. Goldney.)

[BILL 236.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. GRAY said, he had some doubt whether the Bill, in its present shape, would strengthen the hands of the sanitary authorities in Ireland. He was inclined rather to think that it would diminish the power of these authorities to deal with the evils of overcrowding and unhealthy dwellings for the poor. However, he confessed he had not given to the Bill sufficient consideration to induce him to seek to impede in any way its progress; and he had only to express a hope that the next stage would be fixed for a period sufficiently distant to afford time for communication on the subject with some of the sanitary authorities in Ireland.

MR. MONK said, he should be glad to know what were the intentions of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens) with regard to proceeding with the Bill that night, because he intended to oppose the 5th clause, which might give rise to some little discussion? That clause would compel the local authorities to purchase tumble-down houses, or houses which were unfit for habitation, if the owners should require them to do so. He did not know whether that clause had attracted the notice of the Government; it was an important clause; and he wished to ask his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury, whether he intended to move to report Progress after the House had gone into Committee, or to press the Bill through that stage?

MR. W. M. TORRENS remarked, that it had been found, by practical experience, that without the compensation for which the Bill made provision it was wholly impossible to work the other powers given by law. He trusted that his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) would not persevere in his opposition to progress being made with the Bill, since it would be open to him on the Report to move either to amend or to expunge the clause to which he had referred. He hoped that, as the Government had had this matter under their consideration for weeks, and he might say, for months, and as there was no general opposition in the House itself to the measure, it might be allowed to pass through Committee that night.

MR. ISAAC reminded the hon. Member for Finsbury that he had not told the House whether he was willing to accede to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Tipperary County (Mr. Gray), and to fix a distant day, say 10 days hence, for the further consideration of the Bill. Unless the hon. Member was prepared to do that, he must oppose Mr. Speaker leaving the Chair.

MR. W. M. TORRENS thought it must be quite evident that, at this period of the Session, to name 10 days hence for the further progress of the Bill was virtually to discharge the Order. He must remind the House that the measure had yet to go up to the House of Lords. It had been six months before the House of Commons, and as, therefore, ample time had been afforded to every hon. Member to make up his mind as to what course he ought to take in regard to it, he did trust that the House would not think it was an unreasonable request that they should now be allowed to proceed with it. As to the appeal of his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary County, he must say that, at the suggestion of Her Majesty's Government, the Bill was now limited very much to the case of the Metropolis. Its promoters had intended that it should be a general Act; but, in many cases, they had found that the Government were not prepared to extend what was termed the building clauses to the whole of the United Kingdom; and sooner than allow the Metropolis to remain in its present terrible state of overcrowding, those in charge of the Bill had deemed it their duty to take what they could get. Therefore, as the Government intimated their willingness to allow the building clauses to be retained for the Metropolis, leaving the compensation clauses to apply to the whole of the United Kingdom, the promoters thought it better to accept that compromise than to do nothing at all. To that arrangement he adhered, though he should be very glad, personally, to extend the whole of the provisions of the Bill to Dublin and other large towns in Ireland.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped the House might allow the Bill to go into Committee. At the same time, he trusted that the hon. Member for Finsbury might also see the reasonableness of allowing at least a week to elapse before the Report was taken, in order that hon. Members might have an opportunity of considering the Amendments which they might wish to propose. He wished also to say, on the part of the Government, that there was one clause which, until his attention had been called to it that night, had escaped his notice—he referred to the terms on which it was proposed to borrow. He should himself like to consider that matter before it was finally agreed upon; and, therefore, he hoped his hon. Friend would consent, if the Bill were now allowed to pass through Committee, to the postponement of the consideration of the Report for at least a week.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title and construction of Act).

MR. GRAY said, he had a formal Amendment to propose to this clause. The clause defined that the officer of health should be the Medical Officer of Health in England, appointed by the urban sanitary authority of the district under the Public Health Act of 1875. In Ireland, it should be the corresponding officer under the Act of 1878. He, therefore, begged to move, in line 22, after "1875," to insert—

"And as respects any urban sanitary district in Ireland, shall be the Medical Officer of Health appointed by the urban sanitary authority of the district, under the Public Health Act of 1878."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 2, 3, and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Owner may require local authority to purchase premises).

MR. MONK remarked, that the clause proposed to throw a very heavy burden on the ratepayers, by compelling the local authorities to purchase any houses which might be considered as unfit for habitation. If an individual purchased house property which was in a bad state of repair, he ought—and under the existing law he was obliged—to rebuild, or put it in a fit state for habitation. He saw no reason why the ratepayers should be called upon to purchase such property; and yet, if the owner of it pleased, he could, under this Bill, compel the local authorities to take it off his hands. He did not know what view the Government took of this clause. He certainly thought it deserved their very serious consideration, and he should himself say "No" to the question that the clause stand part of the Bill.

MR. DILLWYN thought the Committee ought to have some explanation respecting this clause. He quite agreed with what his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had stated. It seemed to him that if this clause were passed it would operate in the direction of preventing the local authorities from undertaking the smallest improvements, owing to the fear they would have that if they were to give notice of any buildings being in a dangerous state it would be necessary to purchase the whole of them.

MR. MONK repeated, that there could not be the slightest reason why an owner of a site should force the ratepayers to buy it; and, in order to raise that question, he moved to leave out all the words after "premises," to the end of the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. W. M. Torrens

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, that experience had shown that in the Metropolis it was impossible to effect any improvement in the over-crowded districts, unless the local authorities were enabled to compensate the owners of property. He had presented Petitions from various local bodies, all asking that this Bill should pass. The practical effect of taking away that power which the rate-payers themselves had asked for would be to destroy the whole chance of the Bill working. He left it to the Government to say whether it was worth while defending the clause.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped that the Committee might not assent to the removal from the Bill of what, practically, was the soul and body of the measure. A former Bill of the hon. Member had proved a dead letter in consequence of its containing no such power as this clause proposed to give. The Government had been induced to give the measure their support, because it sought to deal with a class of buildings not dealt with in a more recent Act of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and supplied a link in a very useful class of legislation by removing a difficulty which had hitherto stood in the way of the local authorities in dealing with many of those terrible eyesores and nuisances which existed in the midst of their large towns, and especially of the Metropolis. Under these circumstances, he did hope that the Committee would not, at the eleventh hour, deprive the measure of the provision which alone would make it a useful one.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 19, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 20 (Power of local authority to make bye-laws for regulation of dwelling-houses).

MR. SALT said, that on behalf of his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, he had an Amendment to move at the end of this clause. The clause gave power to local authorities to make bye-laws; but it was not usual to give such power to the local authorities without some control or authority from the Central Department, and the words he had to propose on behalf of his right hon. Friend at the end of the clause were these—

"A bye-law under this Act, and any alteration made therein, and any repeal of a bye-law, shall not be of any validity until it has been submitted and confirmed by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, in the case of the Metropolis, or by the Local Government Board in the case of all other places."

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "A bye-law under this Act, and any alteration made therein, and any repeal of a bye-law, shall not be of any validity until it has been submitted and confirmed by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, in case of the Metropolis, or by the Local Government Board in the case of all other places."—(Mr. Salt.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. LEE MAN characterized the Amendment as centralization to the utmost extent, and hoped the Committee might not agree to it.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 17; Majority 15.—(Div. List, No. 165.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 21 (Expenses of local authority).

MR. PELL moved, in page 7, line 37, to leave out the words "three pence," and to insert the words "a penny." He thought they had already had several warnings on the subject of expenses chargeable on the rates under Acts of this description, and that it would be wise to limit the amount of money to be expended.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 37, to leave out the words "three pence," in order to insert the words "one penny."—(Mr. Pell.)—instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words 'three pence' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 14; Noes 32; Majority, 18.—(Div. List, No. 166.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'one penny' be there inserted."

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he did not like to interfere, as the hon. Member in charge of the Bill had made no appeal to the Committee; but he really would like to ask whether hon. Members were really in earnest—[“Yes, certainly!”]—in wishing to put in this sum? The limitation to a penny, in London, at any rate, would render it impossible, practically, to carry out any work under this Bill. He would remind his hon. Friend he had quoted the expenditure of the hon. Member.

MR. PELL was referring to the Artizans' Dwellings Act. In that Act the amount was unlimited, while here they had a fixed sum. He hoped the Committee would give their decision against adopting 2*d.* instead of 1*d.* in order that they might improve away this measure, the further progress of which seemed to him undesirable.

MR. DODDS reminded the Committee that the Act applied to the whole country; but if the hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill would confine its operation to the Metropolitan district, he would just as soon have 2*d.* inserted as 1*d.* In these times of intense depression he strongly objected to this increased taxation.

MR. BARING supposed that the Committee had not voted without knowing what they were about. Festina lente was a motto which it would have been better if some hon. Gentlemen had remembered, and then they would have done more good, probably, in the end.

MR. DILLWYN said, the Artizans' Dwellings Act was by no means a failure everywhere; for, in his own borough, it had been put into operation very successfully. His objection to the Bill was that it enabled owners to get rid of what was very likely worthless property to the Boards. That Proviso, he thought, would very likely impede the progress of the Act, because it would prevent authorities from giving notice, and so putting themselves into the power of the owners, and being forced to purchase properties, whether or no.

MR. W. M. TORRENS reminded the Committee that under the 5th clause compulsory power was given. He thought it was rather hard to raise this objection again, after what had been conceded. This Bill, by doing a little work here and there would save a great amount of other work under the Artizans' Dwellings Act. This was an alternative plan; but if the Committee would not adopt it he could not help it.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

MR. PELL thought his Amendment was entirely consistent, for under the Bill money was only required for the purchase of tumble-down buildings, and surely a penny rate would be enough for that.

MR. GRAY doubted whether the Act would apply anywhere outside the Metropolis. At the same time, he did not see the good of passing it, and in the same breath rendering it inoperative. As the Committee had come to a conclusion not to allow 3*d.*, he thought, at least, it might allow 2*d.*; otherwise, it would be far better not to load the Statute Book with inoperative Acts.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 15; Noes 31: Majority 16.—(Div. List, No. 167.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON moved to insert “two-pence.”

MR. PELL asked whether they could not split the difference, and say 1½*d.* At first they were all in favour of 1*d.*; but the suggestions from the Front Bench had inclined some hon. Members to change their minds.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 22 (Loans from Public Works Loan Commissioners).

MR. PELL moved, in page 8, line 16, to leave out the words “and also all mortgages of the local rates.” The sites should be sufficient security on which to raise the sum required for the construction of the new premises. It seemed to him very dangerous to pledge the rates for purposes of this sort.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 16, to leave out the words “also by a mortgage of the local rate.”—(Mr. Pell.)

The Committee divided: Ayes 28; Noes 16: Majority 12.—(Div. List, No. 168.)

MR. LEEMAN moved to report Progress. He appealed to the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill not to press it further. It was then 3 o'clock in the morning. The opposition to it was evidently bond fide; and as there were only just the number of Members in the House sufficient to transact Business, he hoped his Motion would be accepted.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Leaman.)

MR. W. M. TORRENS replied, that they were very nearly through, and they might as well go on.

Motion negatived.

MR. GRAY thought the limitation of the period of repayment of loans of seven years was too small. That would involve a repayment yearly of 15 per cent. In order to raise the question, he moved to substitute the words "twenty-one."

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, this limitation was introduced by arrangements with the Government in order to prevent money being borrowed for an excessive term. He himself, personally, entirely concurred in wishing to extend the period.

Amendment negatived.

MR PELL desired to point out that they were getting into some little confusion. The Amendment made in Clause 5 evidently showed that it was the opinion of the Committee that power should be given only to purchase structures; yet they were now proceeding to give power to mortgage the site which would not belong to the Board. He, therefore, thought they had better report Progress, in order that those in charge of the Bill might consider the matter.

MR. ISAAC pointed out that any alteration might be moved on Report.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 23 agreed to.

Schedule A.

MR. SALT moved (for Sir JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG) to insert in the third column, line 17, the word "or."

MR. W. M. TORRENS explained that the effect of the clause was to give the Metropolitan Board of Works alternate jurisdiction, so that if the Vestries would not undertake the work they might. He entirely agreed with the Amendment.

MR. DILLWYN asked if the clause gave additional power to the Board of Works! ["Yes!"] Then, certainly, this clause should be thoroughly explained.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, there was a belief in some districts that the Vestries would hang fire, and not put this Act into force. In that case, they proposed to give a discretionary power to the Board of Works to overrule them. It was not proposed that that work should be out of the general rate of the Metropolis, but that the Board of Works should come in and do the work, and charge it on the rates of the Vestry.

COLONEL MAKINS could not see why, if the Vestrymen, who might be presumed to know all the requirements of their own district, did not choose to carry out the Act, that it was a proper thing for the Board of Works, composed of men from other parts of London, who did not know very much about the district in question, to come in to interfere.

MR. PELL said, the effect of the clauses would be to put the Vestrymen between the upper millstone of the Local Government Board and the nether millstone of the Board of Works, with a medical officer of health turning the handle. Surely these gentlemen were entitled to form an opinion whether work was necessary to be done, and he did not see why they should give a new authority power to overrule them. The Board of Works, with designs for streets and quays, and great works generally, might be influenced by considerations which would not influence the Vestry. He trusted they would be allowed proper time to consider this Amendment.

MR. SALT said, that he was not in charge of the Bill; but, referring back to Clause 12, the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) would find that the Amendment proposed not to create any new power of rating, but, on the contrary, to prevent the possibility of raising a certain rate; but he should prefer to leave his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) to deal with the matter on Report, and, therefore, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS BILL.

(The Lord Truro.)

(NO. 125.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD TRURO, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he had been induced to lay this Bill on the Table of the House by the numerous Petitions against the practice of vivisection signed by many thousands of persons—whose opinions, he might observe, were shared by a large number of medical men, some of them of undoubted eminence in their Profession. The object of the measure was to extend the provisions of Martin's Act, which applied to domestic animals only, to all animals whatever; and to prohibit the practice of vivisection for experimental purposes, or for any other purpose than that of alleviating or curing any disease from which the animal operated upon was suffering. He desired to treat the subject in the most rational and not in a rhetorical manner. The measure which had been passed by the Government a few years ago—the 39 & 40 Vict. c. 77—though framed with the best intentions, did not meet the views of those who entertained the sentiments he did on the subject of vivisection. It was quite true that the measure was framed in accordance with the Report of the Royal Commission which had been appointed to inquire into the matter; but a very eminent man told him that a Royal Commission was not generally an impartial tribunal, because its Members were chosen by those who had a bias with the object of seeing whether that bias was not well founded. He did not say that was a correct view, because he himself had always supposed that the object of a Royal Commission was to sift evidence and ascertain the truth; but it was impossible not to see in the proceedings of the Commissioners, who were not scientific men, if not a bias, certainly an inclination to adopt the views and opinions of the Medical Profession in relation to vivisection. Those who opposed vivisection did so, in the first place, on the ground that it was cruel and immoral; and, secondly, that it did not offer to the public the advantages which the Medical Profession claimed for it. If medical men were engaged in seeking remedies for nervous pains, he would suggest that vivisection was useless for that purpose; because nervous disease arose from hereditary cause or from excess. It was said that vivisection was valuable in the discovery of diseases of the liver and kidneys; but that proposition was denied by competent authority. The Royal Commission reported, however, that it was desirable to permit vivisection under certain regulations; and, under the Act of 1876, the practice was subjected to conditions and restrictions. But the thousands who had sent up Petitions against the practice believed that all restrictions were a failure. A witness stated to the Commissioners that from what he knew of medical schools and medical students, he believed that restrictive regulations would not be carried out by them. That was the evidence, not of a layman, but of an eminent medical man. He believed that those who advocated vivisection were led away by an Utopian idea—they hoped, through it, to arrive at a state of things which was utterly hopeless; and they alleged that if vivisection were prohibited humanity would suffer. That was not the opinion of the late Sir William Fergusson. The great discoveries in medicine and surgery had not been made by vivisection; they were the results of the careful work of trained anatomists, or of clinical observation and that long experience which was the basis of sure knowledge on all subjects. Again, it was said that if vivisection were prohibited here our medical students would go to Germany. He would let them go there rather than have in this country anything like the horrors they read of as being perpetrated in the medical schools of Germany and France. In all Professions there were enthusiasts; and he believed that the medical men who advocated vivisection were mistaken, and overrated their success in scientific discovery. There were enthusiasts in the Legal Profession and in the Church; but the law compelled even the last class of enthusiasts to keep within bounds. He believed that one witness told the Royal Commission that through vivisection he hoped they would discover a remedy for snake bites within 50 years. Let their Lordships only think of what an amount of suffering would be inflicted on countless animals in that time if the practice of vivisection were continued. Would the remote chance of a discovery for snake bites in 50 years justify them in permitting such an amount of suffering? Could their Lordships think that those who were moving in the matter would let it rest if the Bill were rejected? Certainly, he did not expect to carry the measure he now offered for their Lordships' acceptance; but thousands on thousands had petitioned for the total proscription of the practice, and the time was not far distant when there would be such a demand for its total abolition that there would be no alternative but to pass a measure of the same kind. As to licences, 45 licences for vivisection were granted in 1878; but of these 18 were not acted on. The number of experiments performed under the 27 active licences were 481. As to their nature, he would refer their Lordships to Return No. 127, from which it appeared that 317 experiments were performed under the licence alone; 87 under special certificates for experiments without anæsthetics; 30 under certificates permitting experiments illustrative of lectures, for which the use of anæsthetics was obligatory; 5 certificates dispensing with the obligation to kill the animal before recovery from anæsthetics—the experiments, about 18 in number, under these certificates being included in the 87 just mentioned. Whatever might be thought of these figures, those whom he represented were not satisfied with the results shown by that Return, though those who opposed the Bill might be. He and the petitioners felt that the practice was unjustifiable, and that it was impossible by any regulations to prevent the infliction of unnecessary pain on the animals subjected to vivisection.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Truro.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months said, that the noble Lord who had moved the second reading objected, in the first place, to the practice of vivisection; and, next, to the manner in which the Act of 1876 had been administered. He (Earl Beauchamp) must say that if there was any justification for the violent language that had been used that Act had been founded on a wrong principle. But he found that, in his evidence before the Royal Commission, Sir William Fergusson stated that he would not go the length of restraining rational men from doing what they thought necessary in experiments on living animals; but he would be for great caution in such experiments. Dr. Haughton also, who was claimed as an opponent of vivisection, declined before the Commission to say that he would in all circumstances entirely prohibit vivisection, though he did say that he would not leave any discretion to the operator. Both these eminent authorities were not opposed to vivisection under certain conditions. The noble Lord had sneered at Sir James Paget for saying that in 50 years a remedy might be discovered for snake bites, and asked whether vivisection was to be permitted on the chance of a discovery for the cure of snake bites 50 years hence? But when it was remembered that each year 20,000 human beings lost their lives from snake bites in India, their Lordships would probably be of opinion that a cure for snake bites would be a discovery of the last importance, and that the lives and suffering of our fellow-subjects in India deserved, at least, some consideration at the hands of the noble Lord. Every humane mind must shrink from contemplating the sufferings which were inflicted on animals; but they could not forget that men of the most humane character were in favour of experiments of this nature; but a good deal of prejudice existed on the subject of vivisection. Within the last 30 years the whole question had been changed by the discovery of anæsthetics, and how had the benefits of this discovery been gained? A knowledge of the use of anæsthetics had been gained because, in the first instance, they had been tested on the lower animals. In the evidence given before the Royal Commission there was an account of the most useful discoveries for alleviating human suffering which had been made by means of vivisection. Knowing that to be the case, and also that, at the present time, there was an immensely increased activity of physiological and biological research, the question arose how they were to deal with the circumstances in which they found themselves? In 1875, two Bills on that subject were introduced into Parliament—the one in that, and the other in the other House; and the result of those Bills was the issue of a Royal Commission. A third Bill dealing with vivisection was presented to the Royal Commission by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The publicity of the proceedings of that Society, he must say, contrasted very favourably with the extraordinary secrecy and mystery adopted by the Society which promoted the Bill now before their Lordships. That Society shrank from affording proper facilities for duly testing the assertions and opinions they uttered. The Bill submitted by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals to the Royal Commission provided that vivisection, under anæsthetics, in a registered place, and by a licensed person, might be allowed, but not for the purpose only of acquiring manual dexterity and skill. The Royal Commissioners drew up a Report, which was unanimously agreed to. That Report was embodied in the Act of 1876, the provisions of which, as far as they differed from the Report, were more stringent in the restrictions and regulations which they laid down. Then came the Act of 1876, under which a person holding a special licence from the Secretary of State might, with a view to the advancement of physiological knowledge, the prolongation of human life, or the alleviation of human suffering, perform those operations on animals under the influence of anæsthetics in a place which was properly registered. It was further provided that a person holding a special licence, and having a certificate from competent scientific authorities might, with the same object, in a duly registered place, perform such operations without anæsthetics, but on condition that the animals operated upon were reduced to insensibility. Parliament, after the fullest deliberation, sanctioned and adopted that policy of regulation. That policy the present Bill sought to reverse. It would repeal the Act of 1876, and substitute new provisions. If they were to take their stand on the principles laid down by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Truro), why were they to limit their sympathy, as was now proposed, to "vertebrated" animals? There was something half-hearted in stopping short in that way, and not including invertebrated animals also. On the other hand, he did not know the full meaning of the words "wantonly or barbarously," used in the 3rd clause; but he thought, perhaps, they might bring within its scope anybody who shot a rabbit. He next came to the consideration of how the Act of 1876 had worked. Returns on that subject had been laid before Parliament; and while he rejoiced at the very limited number of the operations which had been performed, he held that it did not follow that these experiments ought to be prohibited altogether. They had been told that the demand for vivisection was increasing, and that the appetite for it grew by what it fed upon. Therefore, it was satisfactory to find that the practice was not so large.

adopted as they had been led to anticipate. The noble Lord talked of the suffering of animals; but what was the alternative? A witness of the highest authority had pointed out this obvious result—that if the Medical Profession were precluded from acquiring knowledge by these experiments they would be driven to experiment on their patients. The whole case against undue restrictions on vivisection was that the repeal of the Act of 1876 would really throw open the door to the consequences which were sketched in the Report of the Royal Commission—namely, either that those who were actuated by a thirst for science would pursue those operations in privacy and without due securities against abuse; or they would have some of the most intelligent and promising of their medical and surgical students driven to other countries. He did not think that either of those results would be satisfactory. Further investigation, he was sure, would remove a great deal of misconception with regard to the object of those who, from the highest and purest motives, had pursued these researches. They had to consider how to make use, in a proper manner, of the means which Almighty God had placed in their hands. The passing of this Bill would be a retrograde step, and would strike a serious blow at that research which had done so much to alleviate human suffering.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months").—(The Lord Steward.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY requested leave for a few words on this and question. He said that, notwithstanding what had been urged in answer to the noble Lord (Lord Truro), that noble Lord had done right in presenting a Bill for the total abolition of the practice of vivisection. Licences had been freely granted for painful experiments; for dispensing with anæsthetics, and with the obligation to kill the suffering animals after the experiment had been performed. Now, if this was done under the superintendence of a Secretary of State who had brought in the Bill, and who had ever declared himself, and truly, he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) believed, to be anxious for every possible abatement of the evil, what they were to expect from anyone who might succeed him, and whose opinions, tinged by the idolatry of the day, were that everything was to be sacrificed to the image of science? No one, he believed, had laboured harder than himself to carry the present experimental Act. He had hoped much amelioration from it, but he found none; and more especially was he convinced of its inutility when he saw licences and certificates granted to Dr. Rutherford, whose abundant and cruel experiments were set out in the Report of the Royal Commission, and who himself had declared that his experiments, to be conclusive, must be tried on the living man. That Professor, moreover, did not stand very high in the medical world. His attention had been directed to the Hunterian Oration by Dr. Moxon in 1877, in which the Professor's doings were elaborately ridiculed, which remarks were endorsed and supported by many medical authorities. But the Act, he maintained, was not only useless, it was delusive and misleading. Many persons were lulled into a belief that by its provisions protection was afforded. So it was, no doubt; but it was protection to the vivisectors, and not to the animals. The noble Earl (Earl Beauchamp) had enlarged on the security of anæsthetics. He (the Earl of Shaftesbury) might ask on that point some preliminary questions. Were the anæsthetics administered at all? Were they carefully and accurately administered? What were they? Were they effective? Was it chloral? If so, a very weak application. Was it curare? If so—and he said it on the authority of the great vivisector, Claude Bernard—that it caused more suffering than it attempted to prevent. Was it morphia? Why that only utterly subdued the victim, without deadening the pain. There was much delusion in all these assurances; there was little confidence to be placed in them. But no fact had more influenced his judgment than the announcement of a public memorial to the well-known operator on animal life, M. Claude Bernard. This memorial was supported by many of the most scientific men in England, who testified their admiration of his zeal and skill in this department of science. He asked permission to give one specimen, out of many instances, perhaps hundreds, of the deeds of that singular man.

"We cut out the kidneys from a bull-dog" [a pretty statement to begin with]. "Next day, twenty-four hours after the operation, the dog, without being enfeebled, appeared dejected, respiration was impeded, and sighing. He had vomited during the night. He refused all food and avoided movement, appeared to suffer, and at times cried out. In order that his cries should not disturb the neighbours we applied a muzzle pretty tightly." [What a spirit of consideration for the peace of the locality!] "When during the day we returned we found the dog lying dead, his muzzle bathed in a fetid fluid, which he had vomited. The muzzle had hindered the expulsion of the vomiting and caused the animal to be suffocated by it."

Such was the man that the philosophers delighted to honour! And that was the work of science!—of that which its worshippers called science—and yet among the promoters of the memorial might be found some who had testified, in the strongest manner, against the infliction of needless pain, and the practice of mere speculative vivisection. What, then, could be a fuller proof of a cruel and morbid curiosity, and what hope remained that investigators and operators, delighting in such things, would respect the principle, and be restrained within the limitations of the Act? Now, further, he observed that since the passing of the Act, as well as before, many learned lectures had been delivered, and many learned treatises published, denying altogether the value of vivisection; nay, more, maintaining that the results were fallacious, and more likely to lead to error than to truth. The contradictions of vivisectionists were surprising. They agreed in nothing but that the animals should be cut up. Now, the three following questions had been propounded and admirably handled in a recent work by Dr. Gimson:—

"1. Have vivisections and painful experiments been of any scientific value? 2. Have they led to the discovery of scientific facts of permanent importance? 3. Are there not fallacies underlying such a method of interrogating Nature, which of necessity vitiate the results?"

Many sound and really scientific men were prepared to say "No" to the first two questions, and "Yes" to the third; and most justly, too. For was it not manifest that safe and accurate conclusions could not be drawn from examinations of an animal reduced to such an abnormal state? Were it placed under an anæsthetic, would not all its internal functions—he did not pretend to use professional language—be altered or suspended thereby, so as utterly to nullify all close and reliable deductions as to what might be the case in its natural and ordinary state? Was it under the operation of the knife, pure and simple—would not the pain, the terror of the wretched victim, render the conclusions still more fallacious? The vivisectionists, many of them, felt the force of the argument. To evade it, they asserted—and, nevertheless, had the audacity to call themselves masters in science—that the poor animal whined and winced, and gave every indication of suffering, but that it was hard, dull, insensible. Others, claiming some portion of humanity, rejoiced that the animals had no forethought, at least, of the tortures that awaited them—an argument which, if of any value at all, might, in their zealous regard for the comfort of the human race, be brought to bear on the vivisection of idiots and babies. But scientific men of this stamp should be listened to when deploring their own ill-success. What said the famous Claude Bernard? Why, after 30 years of operations on living animals, he confessed—

"Our hands, without doubt, are empty to-day, but our mouths full, it may be, of legitimate promises for the future;"

and he said no more; but yet that was the sole result of countless experiments of the most cruel description. And what said Dr. Rutherford? He (the Earl of Shaftesbury) must again refer to him. He allowed that—

"His experiments were only suggestive of inferences, which, to become conclusive, would require the experiments to be tried on man."

Exactly so; but what, then, had been gained by this almost unprecedented torture of animals? Why, the important admission that continued experiments were useless, and that man himself must be subjected to torture before that Professor could arrive at a conclusion. And yet to this Professor had the power been renewed of the free and fruitless use of the knife! The vivisection of man was no new thought; the proposition had once been made by the great Professor Cheselden, and was rejected, solely because public opinion was not then ripe for such a step in scientific pursuit. He was happy to state that resistance was spreading rapidly, and extending through all parts of Europe and in America. Associations had been formed in France, in Italy, in Germany, and in Russia, for the total suppression of vivisection. Persons of all ranks and degrees, Professors and learned men were at the head of those associations, and much good had already been effected at Alfort and at Florence by their combined exertions. It was impossible, he said, in discussing this question, to avoid the repetition of old arguments and the production of similar instances. The opponents of the system urged, and urged truly, the brutalizing effects on the minds of the vivisectors, and on the minds of those who approved them. He would quote, in brief, but one instance; but it was a striking one, and he implored their Lordships to listen to it—it was extracted from an address delivered at Dresden by Baron Ernest von Weber, who took it from the work of Professor Goltz, of the Physiological Institution at Strasburg—

“A very clever, lively young female dog, which had learnt to shake hands with both fore-paws, had the left side of the brain washed out through two holes on the 1st of December, 1875.”

He begged them to mark the coolness and evident pleasure with which he thus treated his pet companion.

“This caused lameness in the right paw. On being asked for the left, the dog immediately lays it in my hand. I now demand the right; but the creature only looks at me sorrowfully, for it cannot move it.”

Did their Lordships observe how he relished his barbarous experiments?

“On my continuing to press for it, the dog crosses the left paw over and offers it to me on the right side, as if to make amends for not being able to give the right.”

Without that fact, recorded on such authority, would it have been thought possible that an educated man should have been insensible to such an appeal? But he was so, and, revelling in his science, he prolonged his amusement.

“On the 13th of January a second portion of the brain was destroyed.”

But that was not enough—

“On the 15th of February a third, and on the 6th of March a fourth, this last operation causing death.”

Thus, to gratify the peculiar taste of the inhuman wretch, that poor little animal was kept under torture and examination, as foolish as it was ferocious, from the 1st of December to the 6th of March, a period of more than three months. Now, in what way, he asked, was true science advanced by such curious and refined cruelty? In what way was man benefited or knowledge blessed by such discoveries? And yet these were the certain and necessary consequences of legalized vivisection. Scientific men, he said, and, indeed, others, who ought to know better, were pleased to talk of the “lower animals.” In what sense was the epithet “lower” to be applied to that affectionate little thing? Had their Lordships observed its unabated attachment to its cold-blooded master? Had they not been struck by its spirit of forgiveness under treatment so cruel? Had they not seen an exhibition of qualities that would have become a thinking being? And that was the use they made of the creatures committed to their charge—that the account they would render of their stewardship. All he could say was—and he said it truly and conscientiously—that, in every respect, he would infinitely rather be the dog than be the Professor. But whether the law was efficient or inefficient, whether vivisection was conducive to science, or the reverse, there was one great preliminary consideration. On what authority of Scripture, or any other form of Revelation, he asked most solemnly, did they rest their right to subject God’s creatures to such unspeakable sufferings? The thought had troubled the mind of many vivisectors; it had deeply touched the heart of Sir Charles Bell. That they might take the life of animals for food, or to remove danger or annoyance, he fully admitted; but he utterly denied that they were permitted to indulge their curiosity, or even advance their knowledge, by the infliction of exquisite torture on the sentient creation. They were told, in haughty and dogmatic style, that the secrets of Nature could be learnt in no other way. Learned in no other way! Could it be believed that the Almighty had issued such a decree? The animals were His creatures as much as we were His creatures; and “His tender mercies,” so the Bible told us, “were over all His works.” He, along with many, repudiated such an atrocious and shallow doctrine; and, under that conviction, he would ever do his best to put down a system that was as needless as it was cruel.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH said, that it had been his misfortune, on a few occasions, to differ from the noble Earl who had just sat down; but he had never done so with more reluctance than on the present occasion. He sympathized so heartily with the feelings he had expressed, and concurred so entirely with the sentiments of the concluding part of his speech—that the question had to be settled on principle, and that the lower orders of the creation had rights as against us, inasmuch as they, like ourselves, were God's creatures—such was his abhorrence and detestation of the instances of cruelty the noble Earl had mentioned, and such the sincerity of his repudiation of the doctrine that torture might be inflicted under the pretence of searching and interrogating Nature—that it was with great pain and reluctance that he found himself unable to support his demand for making vivisection absolutely illegal. Now, the Bill was directed against cruelty to animals; but everything depended on what was meant by the word "cruelty." He was willing to define it as "the infliction of unnecessary pain." Pain, of course, might be unnecessary in two ways—either when the object was one for which no pain ought ever to be inflicted—as, for instance, when a child tortured an animal—or, again, when it was in excess of the object for which it was sanctioned. If, however, the object for which pain was inflicted could be justified, and if the pain was not in excess of its object, it could not properly be characterized as cruelty. The question was, whether vivisection was ever necessary in order to preserve or to prolong human life? Now, the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had said the use of animals was given by their Creator for food. But what was food? Food was the means of prolonging human life. The killing of animals for the purpose of prolonging human life was as justifiable in the one case as in the other—nay, more so, because animal food was not necessary to a very large portion—perhaps, one might almost say the majority—of the human race, which sustained human life without the use of animal food. There was more necessity for inflicting pain, if pain was to be inflicted, for the purpose of curing disease than for the purpose of supplying human beings with food. As to the question of the real advantage to the science of surgery or medicine in the way of prolonging human life by the practice of vivisection, a single fact should outweigh any amount of abstract reasoning. He would mention one which he recently heard from one of the most eminent surgeons in London. The gentleman in question had become very famous in his Profession for his great skill and success in performing one of the most difficult and critical operations in surgery—one, of which it was said that the man who attempted it deserved to be tried for manslaughter—and he had declared that he had arrived at his skill and success in the operation, by which hundreds—he might say thousands—of human lives had been saved, by experiments in vivisection tried upon 12 rabbits, and tried under chloroform. Would anyone venture to say that those hundreds of human lives, that had been preserved to their families and children at an expenditure of the lives of 12 rabbits, had been preserved at an extravagant and wanton destruction of animal life? He would ask the noble Earl whether a total abolition of vivisection would not lead to virtual experiments on human subjects, because a surgeon who could not try an experiment upon an animal would, in the interests, or supposed interests, of his patients—to say nothing about the interests of science—be induced to try experiments on human subjects. Of course, they might say, with some plausibility, the human subject would be an assenting party. But that was an entire mistake. A surgeon, on the eve of a critical operation, would not ask his patient's opinion as to the manner in which that operation should be conducted. He earnestly desired that every precaution should be taken against the abuse of the practice of vivisection; but if it were not permitted under regulations, he feared it would be practised surreptitiously, and practised with a disregard of suffering which could not now exist. The securities of the present law might or might not be sufficient. If they were not sufficient, he earnestly hoped they might be made sufficient. In the very interests of human life, and in the interest of the very animal creation, as to the use of which for food they had that Scriptural charter to which the noble Earl appealed, he ventured earnestly to deprecate a complete, immediate, and total abolition of vivisection.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that he was the author of the Act of 1876; it passed their Lordships' House in the same condition as he had introduced it; but in the House of Commons it underwent changes which, in his opinion, deprived it in a great degree of complete effectiveness. The Government, however, decided—and he thought wisely decided—to accept the Bill so altered, and it was incumbent on those who supported this Bill and desired to prohibit vivisection altogether to show that the Act of 1876 had, in some material points, been a failure. The noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), in his most eloquent speech, pronounced that Act to be a failure; but he failed to inform their Lordships in what respect it was a failure. The Act permitted experiments to be made for special purposes, and under special regulations; and if the Secretary of State did his duty he believed the Act of 1876 would work tolerably well. He agreed with the opinion that it was a great mistake to attempt impossible legislation. If their Lordships, in their natural disgust at the horrors perpetrated, framed an Act of such severity that it would be evaded, they would only defeat the object they had in view. And it seemed to him that the Bill of the noble Lord was of that character; it would not only defeat its own purpose, but it would open the door to further abuses. The Return that had been alluded to by the noble Lord (Lord Truro), and which had been recently presented in compliance with the Act of 1876, showed the state of things in regard to vivisection in this country. It showed, no doubt, a considerable number of experiments in last year—481 in all; but of these, 164 were of a character which it was possible to make without the use of anæsthetics, and there were only 16 which were accompanied by possible pain. He maintained that if they had gained only that their Lordships would have achieved an immeasurable blessing as compared with the state of things which preceded the passing of that Act. He could not vote for the Bill which the noble Lord had introduced, for the reason that he did not think the Act of 1876 had been wholly wanting in beneficial effects, and still less did he think that any proof had been given of its failure. He had heard with considerable regret, not so much the remarks of the noble Earl, who, on behalf of the Government, moved the rejection of the Bill, as the tone in which those remarks were made. The noble Earl adopted a tone of apology in referring to the Act of 1876; but he (the Earl of Carnarvon) hoped that was unintentional, and did not indicate the views of the Government on the subject. If the opinion got abroad that the Government was careless as to the enforcing of the restrictions contained in the Act—restrictions which it was the deliberate intention of Parliament to impose—a strong feeling of indignation would be aroused in some of the most powerful classes, who viewed this question, not merely as a matter of sentiment, but as one of gratitude and religion.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, as Chairman of the Commission which sat on the subject, and on whose Report the Act of 1876 was founded, he must give his cordial support to the Amendment. The scientific members of the Commission, he must declare, entered on their inquiry without any bias or inclination in favour of vivisection. The most eminent medical men from all parts of the country were examined before them, and nearly all were in favour of the cause of humanity. The result was the Act of 1876, introduced by the noble Earl; and the Return now referred to showed how beneficially it had worked. So beneficial appeared to him the results that he felt sure that the example which had been set by this country in regard to restrictions upon experiments was one which must, sooner or later, be followed by foreign countries in the civilized portion of the world. As far as he was able to judge, the existing law was being satisfactorily administered; and he saw no reason, at present, at any rate, for altering it.

LORD ABERDARE said, he was connected with the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and he wished to state that that Society had never advocated the total prohibition of vivisection. As the Bill was now drawn, it might be applied to shooting or vaccination. He believed that the existing law on cruelty to animals was very imperfect, and allowed acts of cruelty to be committed fifty times as numerous as those practised in vivisection. He would, therefore, urge upon the Government to make the necessary amendments in the law.

LORD WAVENEY objected to the unscientific manner in which many of the vivisection experiments had been conducted. He thought there was an element of good in the Bill, and that it might be made a useful measure in Committee. He should, therefore, vote for the second reading.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT (1875) AMENDMENT (INTERMENTS) BILL.

(The Earl Stanhope.)

(NO. 123.) THIRD READING.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

LORD ABERDARE rose to move the insertion of three new clauses, which he hoped would receive the support of Her Majesty's Government and also of the Bench of Bishops. Those clauses were not of his own invention, but were embodied, nearly word for word, in a Bill which was introduced by Her Majesty's present Government in 1877. The clauses he proposed were as follows:—

I.—(Provision of unconsecrated ground.)

"In providing any cemetery under this Act the local authority shall set apart a portion thereof which shall not be consecrated; and the cemetery shall be divided in such proportions, and the unconsecrated part thereof shall be allotted in such manner and in such proportions as may be sanctioned by the Local Government Board: Provided always, that if the ratepayers assembled at any vestry duly convened shall, in pursuance of public notice duly given, resolve unanimously that the whole of such cemetery shall be consecrated, it shall not be obligatory on the local authority to leave a part thereof unconsecrated. If at any time within ten years thereafter the vestry, duly con-used in pursuance of public notice duly given in that behalf, should determine that unconsecrated ground shall be provided for such purpose, the provisions of this Act shall be applicable for providing the same.

II.—(Provision of unconsecrated chapels.)

"When a local authority under this Act shall build a chapel for the performance of the burial service according to the rites of the Church of England, they shall also build on the portion of such ground set apart for burials otherwise than according to the rites of the said Church, such chapel accommodation for the performance of burial service by persons not being members of the said Church as may be approved of by the Local Government Board; Provided always, that where it shall appear to such Local Government Board, upon the representation of a majority of the vestry of any parish, consisting of not less than three-fourths of the members of the same, that the building of a chapel upon the unconsecrated part of a cemetery is undesirable and unnecessary, it shall be lawful for the said Local Government Board, if they shall think fit, to signify their opinion to that effect to the local authority, which shall be thereupon released from all obligation to build the same, but such Local Government Board shall not signify their opinion aforesaid unless it be shown to their satisfaction that notice of the intention to propose to such vestry to make such representation was given in manner required by law for notice of vestry meetings, and of the special purposes thereof.

III.—(Burial fees and charges.)

"In any cemetery provided under this Act no fees shall be charged or received by any local authority in respect of any service done or right granted in the unconsecrated part of any cemetery but such as are identical in amount with the fees charged and received in respect of the same service or right in the consecrated portion of such cemetery, less any portion of such corresponding fees or payments which may be received for or on account of any incumbent, churchwarden, or sexton, or of any trustee for or on behalf of any incumbent, churchwarden, clerk, or sexton."

He (Lord Aberdare) did not understand why the Government, having inserted these provisions in their Bill of 1877, should now oppose their insertion in the present measure. He had every respect for rural Local Authorities; but he could not put implicit confidence in them as to the decision of these questions. One part of this Bill contained permissive legislation of the worst description; because it was left entirely to Local Authorities to say whether security should or should not be given against inequality as between Churchmen and Nonconformists in the matter of burial. The noble Lord concluded by moving that the first of these clauses be inserted in the Bill.

EARL STANHOPE said, he was unable to accept the Amendments proposed by the noble Lord. The Bill was on a broader basis than the proposed Amendments—which, indeed, were virtually included in the Bill already, as it was to be construed with the Cemeteries Act of 1847. Under the Burials Act the vestry was obliged to provide consecrated ground; but in the Cemeteries Act this was entirely optional, and the clause ran as follows:—

"The Bishop of the diocese in which the cemetery is situated may, on the application of the company, consecrate any portion of the cemetery set apart for the burial of the dead according to the rites of the Established Church, if he is satisfied with the title of the company to such portion; and the part which is so consecrated shall be used only for burials according to the rites of the Established Church."

The Local Authority, which was a much more important body than the Vestry or Burial Board, was under the Local Government Board, who would probably see to the carrying out of the Bill, and who had to make an annual Report to Parliament. But there was another argument. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) had refused the other night to introduce Amendments into the Racecourses Bill, on the ground that it would endanger the loss of the measure "in another place." In the same way he did not wish to accept Amendments to this small and unpretentious Bill, lest it should fail of being carried in the House of Commons.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he could not support the Amendments—although he approved of many of them, and thought they might have the effect of providing additional safeguards—because, from the late period of the Session and the state of Business in "another place," to accept them would simply be to lose a very useful Bill, which would supply country communities, where the people did not care much about the Burials Question, with additional pieces of ground for the purposes of interment at a little distance from their overcrowded churchyards. Cases where this was required existed probably in thousands. With regard to one of the Amendments, he did not see the advantage of the unanimity which was insisted on as a condition of providing a consecrated ground only. Why should one factious guardian have the power to insist on having two burial-grounds instead of one in a parish where all others were agreed? It had been said that, whereas an abuse existed at Northampton under the Cemeteries Act, none could exist under the Burials Act. But this was not so, as he knew from experience. In a large town in the North of England, which was under the latter Act, the guardians had refused to apply for consecration of any portion of the burial-ground and to pay the necessary fees, although bound to do so by the Act. A portion of the ground was, however, consecrated, as it were, by invasion. But when that portion was exhausted the clergy were compelled, in defiance of the law, to bury in unconsecrated ground. The present was a practical measure, of a healing and excellent character, but one which would not ease off the Burials Question. To send it to be discussed in "another place" would simply be to vote to get rid of it, and that they did not desire to do.

LORD SELBORNE pointed out that the abuse just mentioned by the most rev. Prelate had been in violation of the law, and remedies were provided for disobedience to the law. Those persons who felt themselves aggrieved through the Burial Board refusing to carry out the law might come to the Queen's Bench for a mandamus to compel the Board to do their duty. The Cemeteries Act was never intended to be a compulsory measure; but companies were enabled to acquire land with their own money, and they were at liberty to use it either as consecrated or unconsecrated ground. But the present measure proposed to reverse the policy of the Church Rates Abolition Act, and to use the power of taxing communities by rates for the purpose of providing sectarian burial-grounds. This principle was both new and bad. Those who supported the measure could not have calculated its effect. The fact that particular towns had incorporated the Cemeteries Act in their Improvement Acts furnished no answer to objections on principle to general legislation of this kind. Those Acts belonged to private legislation, and could afford no argument for enabling the Local Authorities everywhere to levy rates in order to provide denominational burial grounds.

The Archbishop of York

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not think it necessary to add anything to what the noble and learned Lord had said as to the abstract principle of this Bill. He merely wished to make one remark. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Stanhope) had referred to his refusal to introduce an Amendment into the Race-courses Bill, lest the measure should be lost through delay. But he could not conceive that there was really any comparison between the case to which the noble Earl had referred and so important an Amendment as the present, which involved the equal treatment of Nonconformists. The Bill as it now stood would inflict upon the Dissenters an additional grievance. He believed the Nonconformist Members in the other House of Parliament felt so strongly as to the justice of these Amendments that if they were introduced they would not oppose the Bill when it went back to "another place."

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK thought there was a complete misapprehension with respect to this Bill. It was not a question of voting by majorities. The Local Authority was quite different from the Vestry to which the noble Lord wished the appeal to lie. It was a Local Sanitary Authority—in fact, the Board of Guardians—who might, if they thought proper, provide a burial-ground for two or three parishes. The Local Government Board would have to be referred to, and would see that the burial-ground was a proper one. All the circumstances of the case considered, he believed that there was absolute security that justice would be done to all parties.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the Local Government Board had no control over the urban authorities, but only over the rural. In his opinion, the Bill would destroy the equality provided by the Burials Act. Though it might be desirable to make better arrangements for cemeteries throughout the country, it ought not to be done at the expense of committing as much injustice as would result from the Bill.

LORD ABERDARE said, that in the present state of the House he would not press his Amendment to a Division.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative: Bill passed.

BILL—(No. 134.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

EARL SPENCER said, he wished, before the Bill left their Lordships' House, to refer to a matter of some importance which had occurred on the previous evening. On more than one occasion reference had been made to negotiations said to have passed between the Irish Government and certain influential personages in Ireland on the University question; and in "another place" Questions were put to, but no Answers were given by, Her Majesty's Government on the subject. His noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition in this House made some inquiry in this House with the same result. On Monday night his noble Friend on the Bench behind him (Lord Emly) alluded, with more distinctness than had hitherto been done, to the subject, and the noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government answered him. Now, he conceived this matter to be one of great importance to Ireland, and explanations ought to be given of what had passed. Very important negotiations appeared to have gone on, or were said to have been going on, in Ireland between the Irish Government and some influential members of the Roman Catholic party touching this University question. Surely, that was a matter of great interest and importance. The noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government, in reply to his noble Friend, described the whole matter as "a romance," and said that neither he nor his Colleagues had any knowledge whatever of the matter. For his part, he would like to know whether the noble Earl, who appeared to be taken by surprise on Monday night, had made it his business to ascertain if any such negotiations had taken place on the part of the Irish Government? It certainly seemed extraordinary that such important communications should have taken place, and should be entirely ignored.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: I certainly was taken by surprise last night by the statement of the noble Lord (Lord Emly) respecting negotiations on the subject of University Education in Ireland; but, although I was taken by surprise, I had no hesitation whatever in expressing my own views upon the question, and informing the House that I then heard of these negotiations for the first time, and could say the same with confidence for my Colleagues. I have since had an opportunity of speaking personally to several of them, and can state that such negotiations are entirely unknown to us. I dare say, when the matter is inquired into, a great deal of misconception will be found to have arisen from the use of the word "negotiations"—that being the term employed by the noble Earl who has just sat down. It is possible that the Lord Lieutenant may have held conversations with those deeply interested in the question of Irish University Education—he may have held conversations with Prelates of the Roman Catholic Church—as the noble Earl (Earl Spencer) himself must have had; but I have no authority for saying that such conversations have been held—it is only a suggestion of mine, to explain what the noble Earl himself seems to think there is no foundation for. I can only repeat what I said last night—that no negotiations to our knowledge have ever taken place on this subject; and if the Lord Lieutenant, for example, had held a conversation of any serious and formal character, he would probably have done me the honour of writing to me on the subject. But there is nothing of the kind; I cannot throw any light on the matter. I take it for granted that some conversations may have occurred, which have been described by the noble Earl by the somewhat important name of "negotiations;" but we have not sanctioned any negotiations, and we know of none that have been entered into on this subject.

EARL GRANVILLE: I must say that it seems rather extraordinary to hear the statement from the noble Earl at the head of the Government that no negotiations have been entered into. I should have thought this matter might have been cleared up by some communication with the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who is in this country. Is he entirely ignorant of what the noble Earl has said on the subject—namely, that a proposal of an important character was made by the Irish Government, and that it was accepted by influential persons connected with the Roman Catholic Church? Has the noble Earl the Prime Minister heard that statement without communicating with any of his Colleagues in the Cabinet? I, of course, accept the assurance of the noble Earl; but still it appears to me an extraordinary business.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: I wish to correct a misapprehension on the part of the noble Earl who has just sat down. I have communicated—as I have already said—with my Colleagues in the Cabinet; but it should be remembered that the Chief Secretary is not a Member of the Cabinet; and when there is a rumour it is not for me to go and ask him whether it is true or not. It is for the authorities in Ireland, when such negotiations take place, to communicate with me, and they have not done so.

LORD EMLY: I think the noble Earl is wrong, when he says I used the word “negotiations” in reference to this subject on the previous evening.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: What I said was, that the noble Earl who spoke first (Earl Spencer) made use of the word “negotiations.”

LORD EMLY: The word I used was “proposal.” What really happened was this. The Irish Government found out, from communication with persons of importance connected with the Roman Catholic Church, that they would be disposed to accept a certain proposal. I made no complaint against the Irish Government. I rose principally for the sake of saying what I ought to have stated yesterday, that, although the Irish Government had neither directly nor indirectly consulted me as to certain proposals made by them in the month of February on the subject of University Education to some leading Roman Catholics in Ireland, I had been shown a copy of these proposals within the last three weeks under no seal of secrecy. I could not understand the heat shown by the Prime Minister on the subject, for the course taken of ascertaining whether the Roman Catholics would accept a measure founded on these proposals was obviously a proper one, and, as the noble Earl (Earl Spencer) had pointed out, according to precedent.

Earl Granville

QUESTIONS.

EXHIBITION OF ZULUS AT ST. JAMES'S HALL.

WITHDRAWAL OF QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS, who had given Notice of his intention to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has stopped the exhibition of Zulus at St. James's Hall; whether, in order to do so, he threatened to get the licence of the proprietors or lessees suspended; by what legal or other process a Home Secretary is enabled to suspend or to interfere with the licence of a public place of amusement; and, whether he is prepared, on behalf of the Government, to pay the damages ensuing from his interference? said, that he learned from the right hon. Gentleman that he had been misinformed, and that he had not, in fact, interfered with the performance of the Zulus at the St. James's Hall. His informant, a Member of that House, had made a mistake. He had to express his regret for having placed the Question on the Paper, and he now begged to withdraw it.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have put the whole of the facts before the Directors, and I understand that the exhibition will take place.

EGYPT—NUBAR PASHA.

QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government has yet received any information as to the notice conveyed to Nubar Pasha, by order of Tewfik Pasha, that he would not be allowed to return to Egypt?

MR. BOURKE: No, Sir; we have received no information on the subject.

CYPRUS—PUBLIC WORKS RETURN.

QUESTION.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the return of the names, nature, and place of employment and salaries of Englishmen employed in Cyprus, and of all public works commenced or authorised up to January 1st 1879 in that island, with their estimated cost, ordered by the House on the 14th of February last, will be presented to the House; and, if he will explain the reason of the delay in presenting it?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, he was sorry he could not state the reasons why the Return had not been presented. It should have been presented, no doubt, before now. He sent to Cyprus a few days after the Return was ordered by the House for the information necessary to complete it; but the information had not been sent. The only cause which he could suggest for the delay was the change in the Government of Cyprus; but he would inquire into the subject.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

QUESTION.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is not proposed in the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill to include officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers alike in the liability to corporal punishment for offences in the field now punishable with death, inasmuch as the heading of the Clauses defining the offences so punishable is in all cases "Every person subject to military law?"

COLONEL STANLEY: No; that is not exactly the case, because every person subject to military law in the clauses specified is liable to the punishment of death, or such minor punishment as may be inflicted. The punishment of death is common to the officers and soldiers; but as regards the other punishments allotted either to the officer or soldier, they will be found by my hon. and gallant Friend in Clause 44.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS AND CORRUPT PRACTICES BILL—LEGISLATION.—QUESTIONS.

MR. B. SAMUELSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, before this Parliament is dissolved, the Amendments deemed by the Government to be necessary in the Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Bill will be proceeded with; and, whether the right hon. Gentleman proposes to proceed with the Bill during the present Session? He also wished to know, whether the right hon. Gentleman is now able to state what will be done with respect to the Railway Commission?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: With regard to the first Question of the hon. Gentleman, undoubtedly the Government are of opinion that the Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Bill should be fully considered by the House and settled before a Dissolution. Whether it will be possible to proceed with it during the present Session I am very uncertain; but I am afraid not. It is among those Bills which we have not taken off the Paper, though I do not think it is likely we shall find time for it. With regard to the Railway Commission, I am not able to answer the Question at present.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE OFFICERS BILL—SALARIES.

QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is intended by a clause in the Supreme Court of Judicature Officers Bill to increase the salaries of sinecure officers, the Judges' associates, from £1,000 to £1,500 a-year?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER), in reply, said, that the offices of Judges' associates were not sinecures. If the Bill passed into law, the salaries of the associates would be increased to £1,500 in the course of three years.

DR. KENEALY gave Notice that he should oppose in every possible way the further progress of that Bill.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 14th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that hitherto he had taken no part whatever in the discussions regarding flogging in the Army, not because he did not take a great interest in the subject, but because he felt great difficulty as to the course which he ought to take. He felt that difficulty still. Her Majesty's Government seemed to him to be afraid to pledge themselves to the complete abolition of the punishment. Although they had, so to speak, narrowed the flogging to a minimum, they were not prepared to abolish it altogether. He had placed upon the Paper an Amendment in the nature of a compromise—a compromise which reduced the liability to punishment—and he was not without that Her Majesty's Government would give a favourable consideration to that view of the case. He had had considerable opportunities of watching the matter. Those who had a greater personal acquaintance with the subject than he had himself were in favour of retaining the punishment. Officers in the Army, who were engaged on active service, were almost unanimous in deprecating the abolition of flogging. They said that the British Army could not be managed without it. At the same time, when he had seen the pertinacity with which Doctors of Medicine and Professors of Theology stuck to the dogmas of their own Profession, he did not think that the opinion of military men should be regarded as conclusive on the subject. It must be borne in mind that flogging had been got rid of in regard to foreign Armies. In the Indian Army, the Sepoys had the same dislike to being flogged that most European soldiers had; and, as a matter of fact, the punishment of flogging was retained in the Indian Army, not so much to be used, but because it was felt to be a scandal to retain it against the European soldier and do away with it in regard to his black brother. So far as his own experience went, it had not induced him to believe, in any great extent, in the necessity for flogging. His experience had been in connection with comparatively seasoned troops, who had gone through the absolute work of war, and not with mere raw recruits. He had seen Her Majesty's troops under very trying circumstances, in the campaigns which followed the Indian Mutiny; and, on the whole, his experience was highly favourable to the discipline of the regular soldier in Her Majesty's British Army. Seasoned troops were trained and disciplined to such an extent that, so long as those in authority over them did what they could to keep them in order, most of them were not likely to commit excesses requiring such a punishment as the lash. He might instance the 9th Lancers, at one time commanded by his late gallant friend Sir Hope Grant. In that regiment, they would as soon have thought of flogging the men as of flogging Members of that House. As regarded the great majority of Her Majesty's troops, they were men of good character, and were not liable to fall into excesses such as it was considered necessary to meet by the barbarous punishment of the lash. When they did break out into excesses, his opinion was that it was more the fault of those in authority than of the men themselves. Properly commanded, and restrained by officers in authority over them, they would not require this barbarous punishment. But, on the other hand, it had been felt, almost by every man who had had any experience of the British Army, that that Army differed from Continental Armies in this—that it contained within its ranks a class of men much more difficult to deal with than was to be found in Continental Armies. The British rough was, no doubt, a worse character than was to be found in any Continental country; and when they had the British rough in the British Army it was found necessary to treat him as a rough, or to let him go away altogether. They were in this dilemma—that when they had men of this character made into soldiers, and rebelling against discipline, they must either bring them into submission, or say—“You have made yourself so disagreeable that you may go.” The opinion was that the only remedy for this state of things was having recourse to the punishment of flogging. It had been his duty to control the administration of punishments of this kind among great populations; and he had been compelled, if he might so express it, to study the subject. The result of that study was certainly not favourable to the punishment of flogging. Without speaking from the popular point of view, but looking at the question in a scientific point of view, flogging partook of the nature of torture. Speaking also in a scientific point of view, he was not altogether against torture as a punishment; but of all the forms of torture used for the punishment of crime, the punishment of flogging was the very worst, because it was the most uncertain in its effects, and for this reason—because the effect of the punishment of flogging upon any man must depend enormously upon the character of the flogger, and also upon that of the floggee. He was prepared to assert, from practical experience, that an enormous amount of the effect of the punishment depended on the man who laid it on. They might have a man who would lay it on in such a manner as to make it a severe punishment indeed; while, in another case, it might be so laid on as to make it no punishment at all. It was not always that the mere observer could detect the punishment that was severe from the punishment that was trifling. They might have a man who laid on the punishment with a great deal of fuss and fury, and yet did not make it tell; and, on the other hand, they might have a scientific flogger, who would make every cut tell. Then, as regarded the physical effect, he had seen some men who would stand an immense amount of flogging, and scarcely feel it; whereas there were others to whom it was an exceedingly severe punishment; so that a flogging which would nearly kill one man, was really laughed at by another. On the other hand, in a moral point of view, they had many men who did not care for that sort of thing. To come to the practical part of the matter. What he wished to ask the Committee to bear in mind was this—they had now gone so far in the matter that they could not, in future, make use of that heavy amount of flogging, which made it a severe and almost barbarous form of punishment, for the punishment of great offences. It was totally impossible that they could ever return to the very severe form of the punishment of flogging in use in days not very far removed. They had now limited flogging to 25 lashes; and he was also inclined to think that the instrument with which it was to be inflicted was a much more harmless instrument than it was in olden times. They had been discussing the question of flogging in the Army; but he did not think an Army cat had been produced for their inspection. They had had a Navy cat. He had himself inspected the last specimen of the Navy cat sanctioned by the First Lord of the Admiralty—and he found that it was very much what he should have expected from the amiable character of the First Lord. It was of a somewhat soft and flexible nature. Indeed, if it were necessary that he (Sir George Campbell) should undergo a flogging he should scarcely object to be flogged with it himself. The moral he wished to draw from all this was this—in the course of the discussion the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), a Member very much respected by the whole of the House, threw out a suggestion that the punishment of flogging should only be inflicted as an alternative for the penalty of death. He (Sir George Campbell) observed, from the nodding of heads on the other side, that that suggestion was received with some favour by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary and other Members of Her Majesty's Front Bench; and what he wanted to impress on the Committee, as the result of his practical experience, was that this mild punishment of 25 lashes, inflicted with a comparatively harmless cat, would be an utter farce, and altogether ridiculous as a punishment for heinous offences. He gathered that they wanted to apply the punishment of flogging for minor offences committed on active service—such as plundering on the march, breaking into a hen-roost, or entering a vineyard, where they required a short, sharp, and exemplary punishment. The advice, then, which he wished to submit to Her Majesty's Government was that they should make up their minds either to retain the punishment of flogging for petty offences on active service, or to get rid of it altogether, and to wipe out what, to a certain extent, would be a thorn in their side if it was retained. He, for one, was in favour of trying the effect of abolishing the punishment of flogging altogether; but, considering that the compromise of retaining it for heinous offences was not possible, he proposed to submit, by the Amendment which he had placed on the Paper, another compromise, and that was that they should put the matter on this footing—that a new or a good man, on entering the Army, should not feel that there was, from day to day, hanging over him, if he got into a scrape for some little peccadillo, arising out of the excitement of the moment, the apprehension that he might have rendered himself liable to the punishment of flogging, and to feel disgraced for ever after. He wished the Committee to save the really good and respectable soldier from that painful position; and he firmly believed that the fear of incurring this degrading punishment deterred a good many eligible and valuable men from entering the Army. The punishment, if it was to be inflicted at all, should be reserved for those who had already, by their acts and deeds, been stigmatized as dangerous characters, who had been selected and set apart as bad men. In regard to that class only, he proposed that the punishment of flogging should, in future, be inflicted. It seemed to him that there was a very good reason why this proposal should receive favourable consideration, for at the present moment it was actually the rule in the Navy. In the Navy it was only men who had been degraded to the second class that were liable to be punished by flogging. First-class men were not liable to be flogged at all. This was actually the rule for some time in the Army, and he did not know how it came to be abolished. Therefore, his proposition was merely to apply to the Army a rule which was once the rule in the Army, and a rule which was now actually the rule in the Navy. The effect of his Amendment would be that no man would be liable to be flogged who had not previously been convicted of a disgraceful offence; and out of 1,000 or 100 men who were now liable to be subjected to that punishment there would, perhaps, not be one who would be liable to be flogged. This compromise would reduce the liability to flogging to an absolute minimum; and in that sense he hoped that those who objected to the punishment, and yet did not regard it as practicable to get rid of the cat altogether, would accept the compromise he suggested. The Amendment which he had placed upon the Paper, and which he now begged to move, was as follows:—In page 19, after Clause 44, to insert the following clause—

“Any soldier convicted by court martial, in addition to any other punishment, may be declared by the court to be a bad and insubordinate soldier; and such soldier shall be entered on a list, to be called ‘the bad list,’ during and for a period of one year after the currency of his sentence, unless the competent authority shall remit any portion of that period. No soldier shall be sentenced to corporal punishment who is not on the bad list previous to and at the time of his conviction.”

What he proposed was, that when the conduct and character of a soldier was bad—that when he had not only been guilty of a particular crime, but was declared to be a man of bad and insubordinate character—the sentence that rendered him liable in future to corporal punishment should be passed. He did not propose that a man should remain on the bad list for a long time; but that the sentence should only have effect for one year after the currency of the sentence; and that a competent authority should have the power of remitting it at any time. The proposal provided that no good soldier should be liable to corporal punishment. The effect would be that in the Army no man of good character would be liable to be flogged; but if a man had committed a crime, and was declared to be of such character that he should be put on the bad list, then, in the event of his afterwards committing certain crimes, he should be liable to be flogged. He was of opinion that by consenting to a compromise of that nature the Committee would retain everything that was necessary; while, at the same time, good, decent, and respectable soldiers would not incur the risk of being subjected to this disgraceful punishment.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not rise, Sir, for the purpose of detaining the Committee at any length in respect of the new clause which has just been moved by my hon. Friend. As to that clause, I entertain very considerable doubts whether the compromise he puts forward is one that would receive the sanction of either the opponents or the advocates of corporal punishment in the Army. I am afraid it would be altogether unsatisfactory to those hon. Members who desire to see the total abolition of corporal punishment, and I hardly think it would be satisfactory to many of its advocates, because it appears to me to diminish, in a very serious extent, the summary, swift and sharp application of the punishment which was felt to be of so much importance. I have no doubt as to the fair and conciliatory spirit in which the clause has been brought forward by my hon. Friend; and I have no doubt, if hon. Members who have more authority and knowledge on the subject than I have receive it with more favour than I think they are likely to do, the Committee will be disposed to give it very careful consideration. But I rise principally for the purpose of taking this, the first, opportunity that seems to me a convenient one for making a few observations on the position this question has assumed, and which has been greatly modified since the Committee first engaged in any regular discussion of the subject of corporal punishment. The Committee is very well aware that I, and many of my Friends on this Bench, have given our support to the Government and to this Bill, not only on general grounds, but also as regards the provisions which relate to corporal punishment. I have myself voted with them on several occasions; and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) has given Her Majesty's Government a considerable amount of assistance in the conduct of the Bill. Under these circumstances, I think I am entitled to say a word in regard to the provisions of the Bill which affects the question of corporal punishment. Hitherto, I have supported the proposals of the Government, and I have done so on this ground. I and my Friends have given our support to the clause affecting corporal punishment on this one, and only, ground—that the discipline of the Army is a paramount consideration. I think we are pretty well agreed that the matter is one of the maintenance of discipline, and that there is no question of humanity involved in it. Her Majesty's Government have disclaimed, with perfect sincerity, any imputation of being less actuated by feelings of humanity than the most determined opponents of corporal punishment. There is one reason, and one reason only, that can induce any Member of this House to advocate the retention of corporal punishment—and that reason is that, in the opinion of the authorities who are responsible for the discipline of the Army, and in the opinion of the Government, who are responsible to the Army, that punishment is indispensable to the maintenance of discipline. Well, now, I am obliged to confess that what has taken place in the Committee has led me very much to entertain a very serious doubt whether the Government have really that clear, fixed, and firm conviction of the absolute indispensable necessity of that punishment which will justify Parliament in continuing it. In order to examine this question, I ask the Committee what has been the course which the Government have taken? The Bill was brought in to provide for the continuation of corporal punishment. It provided that corporal punishment should be inflicted for a large number of offences for which it had been before inflicted. After two or three days' discussion the Government came to the conclusion, on further consideration, that it was unnecessary to retain this punishment for the very large number of offences for which the Bill was originally introduced to provide. They made several concessions. In the first place, they agreed to insert in a Schedule a list of offences for which only corporal punishment should be inflicted. They then consented to a considerable reduction of the amount of the punishment which might be inflicted. Then there were other matters which claimed the attention of the Committee. The Government, I am sorry to say, in the discussion which arose as to the instrument by which this punishment was to be inflicted, showed a very considerable and unfortunate ignorance in regard to the circumstances under which the punishment was inflicted. I then come to the proceedings of Saturday week last. On that morning, as the Committee will remember, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War came down to the Committee and stated that very shortly he would be able to make an announcement of the intentions of the Government which he trusted would be satisfactory to the House. A discussion immediately arose on this subject, and various interpretations were placed on that declaration of the Government. A very general opinion was expressed—not on one side of the House only—that the announcement made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman implied that the Government were prepared to re-consider the whole subject; and by many it was believed that the Government intended to announce the abandonment altogether of this punishment. I do not mean to go over the discussions which have since taken place. A great deal was said as to the exact terms of the information conveyed by the Secretary of State for War; but, in my opinion, a more important declaration was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I hold in my hand an extract from the speech of that right hon. Gentleman, which, as far as I know, is correct. It is so important, that I hope the Committee will allow me to read what the right hon. Gentleman said. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

“It was always a matter of great difficulty how they were best to restrain these outrages; and they had to consider whether corporal punishment was absolutely and essentially necessary for that purpose. Similarly, in the case of prisons, they had to consider the question of how discipline was to be maintained; and if they had to subordinate the first emotions of humanity to other considerations in the course of these discussions, the Government had been obliged to maintain and assert a stricter and severer view than that suggested by those who were merely actuated by the first emotions of humanity. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, however, had now declared that they were prepared to consider this question as a whole; and his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War had stated that he would be prepared, at a subsequent stage of the Bill, to make a statement to the Committee as to the views of the Government on this matter.”—[3 Hansard, ccxlvii. 1573.]

Now, it seems to me it would hardly be too much to say that the effect of that statement was to produce an impression that the mere announcement, on the part of the Government, of such an intention in Parliamentary language meant that they were prepared altogether to abandon the punishment. [“No!”] Supposing that the Government had arrived at that decision and intended to communicate it to the House on a future occasion, that was the Parliamentary language that would be employed for preparing the mind of the House for the announcement. I do not wish to give more importance to that statement than it will fairly bear; but the very least that can be said of it is that, in the opinion of the Government, on that Saturday morning, the subject was one which was open to complete re-consideration as a whole; that, in fact, it was for them, as well as for the Committee, an open question, and it was open for them as well as for the Committee to arrive at entirely opposite conclusions from those which had guided them up to that time. This is a very important question—on which I think it would be well that the Government gave a clear and not uncertain voice. It has been mentioned—and mentioned by persons who ought to have some knowledge of the subject—that this is, in fact, practically the decision at which the Government had themselves arrived—namely, that the punishment might be abandoned, and that they would not meet with any determined opposition from the military authorities in that abandonment. [“No!”] I am only repeating what has been remarked in other quarters, with some little appearance of authority; and I invite the Government, if it is not the fact, to take an early opportunity of giving it an explicit contradiction. Well, it is further said that the decision at which they arrived on Monday was not in consequence of any determined opposition on the part of the military authorities, but that it was in consequence of some feeling which it was perfectly well known took place in the Lobby of the House on Saturday and Monday week. It was also said that the decision announced was not that of the Government themselves, but a decision forced upon them by a certain section of their supporters. It then became the duty of the Opposition, seeing that the Government were re-considering their position, to re-consider theirs also. On Monday morning week, on consulting with several of my Friends who sit near me, I came to the conclusion which I announced to them at the time, and which I should have been perfectly ready to announce to the House the same evening, if there had been any legitimate opportunity of doing so. The conclusion I arrived at was that whatever might be the decision announced by the Government on that evening, their conduct in regard to the Bill, the hesitation which they had shown, and the effect of their announcement on Saturday, was that they had no such clear conviction in their own minds of the absolute indispensable necessity of the retention of this punishment as would enable the House, or the Opposition portion, at all events, of the House, to continue to them the support which on that ground, and that ground only, had hitherto been given to them. I formed the opinion that, under these circumstances, the condition, and the only condition, essential to the permanent retention of this punishment had disappeared, except, perhaps, that there might still be pointed out very exceptional circumstances. I will now endeavour to explain to the Committee what I mean when I say that I think an exception to what I have stated might be made under exceptional and very limited circumstances. I think that the opponents of corporal punishment have been, to a very considerable extent, pressed by the argument, frequently used in the course of the debates on this Bill, that there are on active service certain occasions when particular crimes and offences are committed—such as insubordination in the field, or plundering on the line of march, or serious offences of that kind—where there is no alternative for the military authorities between corporal punishment and the extreme penalty of death. The opponents of corporal punishment have been somewhat pressed by that argument; and I presume that it was in that sense that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) had placed on the Paper an Amendment, which has since been withdrawn, in which he proposed that corporal punishment should still be maintained, but only as the commutation of a death penalty. The clause which my hon. and learned Friend placed on the Paper was in these terms—into one of corporal punishment to be inflicted in accordance with the provisions of this Act; but corporal punishment shall in no other case be inflicted.”

It seems to me to be clear, from the nature of the announcement made by the Government on Saturday week, that something of the kind was in their minds at that time. I am quite aware that there are many difficulties which may be brought forward by way of objections to this proposal. The most obvious of these difficulties is that it might happen that a court martial might pass a sentence of death without any intention that the punishment of death should be inflicted, but intending only that corporal punishment should be inflicted in its stead. The commanding officer, however, might think the offence deserving of death, and so the death penalty might be inflicted contrary to the intention of the court martial. I do not pretend to say that this difficulty is an insuperable one or not. It has been suggested that the difficulty might, to some extent, if not altogether, be obviated by a proceeding which certainly is not now a very common one, but for which there is a very ample precedent. I believe that, in many cases, it has been found expedient to preface a clause of a Bill by a Preamble, by which the intention of Parliament could be made perfectly clear. The objections which might be raised in this instance would be very much obviated if the clause which I have read were prefaced by a Preamble to the following effect:—

“Whereas it is expedient that corporal punishment should no longer be in use except in cases where the punishment of death would be actually inflicted, unless corporal punishment were inflicted in lieu thereof, be it further enacted,” and so on. I throw out this suggestion for the consideration of the Government. I believe that, if the Government would adopt a Preamble of this character, the intention of Parliament in the clause would be so clearly explained that the difficulty to which I have adverted would be obviated, and the sentence of death would not be passed by a court martial, unless they thought that the crime was one worthy of death; while the power of commutation of the sentence to corporal punishment would be left to the commanding officer. If the Government think that the difficulties in the way of such a course are insuperable, and if they are resolved to retain the punishment of flogging for the numerous offences that are now comprehended in the Schedule to be proposed by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and that no other limitation than the judgment and opinion of courts martial and the commanding officers can be adopted, then I am of opinion that, under the circumstances I have endeavoured to describe, the further retention of this punishment is impossible, and, it being impossible, the sooner it is altogether abolished the better. I need not detain the Committee by pointing to the injury which is done to the discipline of the Army by protracted discussions; I need not point out the injury done to recruiting, especially among the better class of men, unless some satisfactory arrangement is arrived at and continued from year to year. I have only now to say that if the Government do not see their way to adopt some such Amendment as I have suggested—an Amendment which, in my opinion, would meet with a good deal of support on both sides of the House—I shall have no alternative than to give effect to my opinion by my vote, either in Committee or on the Report of the Bill, or whenever an opportunity arises. I need hardly add that, whatever may be the decision of the Committee, after full and thorough consideration, I, at all events, shall be prepared to abide by it. I have no intention of being a party to any proceeding the object of which is simply to delay the progress of the Bill; and I do not promise to lend my assistance to any attempt to get rid by a side issue of what may be proved to be the deliberate decision of the Committee itself on the main question. I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) will claim, as an additional proof of the success of the system which he explained last night, the announcement I have just made on the part of myself and Friends. I should be extremely unwilling to deprive the hon. Member of any credit justly due to him; but I must say that, for the reasons I have endeavoured to explain, the greater part of the responsibility of the course I and my Friends think it necessary to take on this occasion must rest upon the shoulders of the Government themselves, owing to the policy they have thought proper to pursue, rather than upon the shoulders of the hon. Member for Meath. I am willing to admit, to the very fullest extent, the responsibility which rests on the Opposition—a responsibility only second to that which rests on the Government themselves—to support, to the utmost extent, the military authorities in everything that may be necessary for the maintenance of the discipline of the Army. But when, as I think, it is proved, by the course the Government have taken, that they have no clear conviction themselves as to the indispensable necessity of the retention of flogging, I do not see that any obligation rests on the Opposition to support them in a course which appears to me to have been dictated to them, not entirely on their own responsibility and judgment, but by the opinions of a certain section of their own supporters. I must apologise for detaining the Committee at this length; but I thought that time would be saved by my stating, at the earliest possible moment, the opinion which I had formed and which I had hoped to be able to announce to the House more than a week ago.

COLONEL STANLEY: I think that no one, however captious he may be, can complain that the noble Lord has occupied the Committee a moment too long in stating, so frankly as he has done, the views which he holds on this important question. The noble Lord really went to the root of the whole matter in saying that he felt, with other Members of the Committee, that in a matter of this kind the paramount consideration was that of maintaining the discipline of the Army. Following up that statement, he asked whether, in the opinion of the Government, it was considered indispensable, for the purpose of discipline, that corporal punishment should be continued? To that I have to answer that we have carefully considered the subject, and we find ourselves compelled to adhere to the maintenance of corporal punishment in the shape in which it now stands in the Bill; that that decision has been arrived at after great consideration; and that the decision, so far as I and other Members of the Government are concerned, is one from which we cannot depart. Now, the noble Lord has said that much time might have been saved if the Government had taken up a more definite line on this matter. No doubt, in the conduct of this great Bill, a heavy responsibility rested upon those who had to do with it; but, at the same time, we have, in the alterations we have made, so far as relates to the actual matter now under discussion—alterations which the noble Lord chooses to call concessions—endeavoured to meet all objections which might be more or less fairly raised, and to show ourselves, as far as possible, willing to accept that which might appear to be the general feeling of both sides of the House. The noble Lord has referred to the recital of certain crimes in the Schedule. I do not wish to quarrel about the terms; but the object I had in assenting to provide such a Schedule was very much to assist the Committee, by showing, as clearly as possible in the Bill, for what crimes corporal punishment should be inflicted. With regard to the amount of punishment—from 50 lashes to 25—that is a matter which has been so recently before the Committee, that it would not be very convenient that I should re-introduce it. Now, we come to the point upon which the noble Lord attaches considerable importance—namely, the statement which I made some 10 days ago. That statement the noble Lord quotes correctly—namely, that in respect to corporal punishment I had been considering the Schedule, and I hoped on the following Monday—that was, yesterday week—to make a statement to the House which I hoped would be satisfactory. Unfortunately, however, the noble Lord hardly did me justice in saying that I had carefully guarded myself, both at that time and afterwards, from any interpretation which persons, in whatever good faith, might choose, looking at the matter from their own point of view, to put upon my words. Then comment was made on the statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Government were considering the question as a whole. I am perfectly prepared to substantiate and adopt the statement of my right hon. Friend. In point of fact, we agreed to place certain crimes in the Schedule; and when we came to select the crimes which appeared the most convenient to place in the Schedule, we considered that the sound principle to go upon was to point out certain crimes which, in military opinion, and as the result of long experience, have been deemed of so serious a character as to be deserving of the punishment of death, but to which corporal punishment might be attached as an alternative. Now, what is there inconsistent in that? To put aside the question of humanity, I may say that all along our contention has been that discipline must be maintained on active service, with the Forces which we have, by means, in some cases, of sharp and summary punishment. In that respect I maintain, without fear of contradiction, that, in the course we have adopted, we are only following out what has hitherto been the custom in the Service; and, moreover, that the custom of the Service has admitted, in times past, of corporal punishment becoming a substitute for the punishment of death which obtains for like offences in foreign Armies. Then, with respect to that point, surely there is nothing in the slightest degree inconsistent in our having said that we should consider the question as a whole; and in saying that, resting ourselves on principle, there were certain crimes to which the penalty of death pertained, but as to some of which—those which were not of the gravest nature—corporal punishment might well be substituted for that of death. Then I come to the question, who are responsible for the retention of this punishment? It may be said—opinions may be expressed here and there—opinions of individual persons—that the Government are responsible for that which has occurred. Her Majesty's Government are responsible for that which they have proposed, and it is upon the authority of the Government that the Schedule has been laid upon the Table. I do not wish to take up the time of the Committee further than upon the general question; and after what I have said at length on former occasions, I should be unnecessarily taking up the time of the Committee if I were now to express myself more fully on the subject. Coming, however, to the suggestion which was thrown out by the noble Lord as regarded the clause placed on the Paper by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), which was to this effect—that corporal punishment should only be inflicted as a commutation of the death penalty—I am bound to say that the noble Lord seemed to speak under a sense of the difficulty which would occur in many cases if these words were inserted in an Act of Parliament. In the first place, there is the obvious objection that they might occasion the passing of a sentence of death in many cases in which the officers composing the court would think and hope the sentence would not be carried out, and thus you would be placing an enormous responsibility upon the officer called upon to commute the punishment. I can easily understand that circumstances might arise in which the court, intending the prisoner to be flogged for some serious dereliction of military duty, would sentence the prisoner to death, but in which the confirming officer might conscientiously feel himself precluded from commuting the punishment. I do not hesitate to say that there are circumstances present to my mind which might cause—which certainly would cause—an increase in death sentences; in all probability, there would be an actual increase in the number of cases in which the penalty of death would be inflicted. That, I think, is the answer I am bound to give to the noble Lord with reference to the clause which originally stood in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport. As regards another suggestion—the addition of a Preamble to recite that the punishment should be considered as a severe one, and only substituted in place of the death penalty there—after carefully considering the suggestion—as I would any suggestion coming from the noble Lord—I confess I find considerable objection; and, on the whole, my disposition at the moment is not in favour of its acceptance. In the first place, the cases where actual corporal punishment can be inflicted are distinctly specified in the Schedule, and not in the body of the clause; and I can find no precedent for a Preamble to a Schedule, though I am far from saying occasion might not arise for the creation of a precedent.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON explained that the Preamble he suggested would be to the clause proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport.

COLONEL STANLEY: Oh, quite so. But, after all, suppose you inserted that Preamble, what practical object would you gain? I hope I shall not be understood as saying it offensively; but it would be only a salve to the consciences of those who would see the necessity of retaining the punishment, and yet would wish to record their objections to it. What object would be gained? Would it be a direction to the Court? To what degree could it possibly affect the circumstances or consideration of any crime which is the subject-matter of these clauses? I have only to say we have once more carefully considered the matter; and we think that the commutation of the punishment to corporal punishment for those crimes for which death can now be inflicted is distinctly a principle in accordance with the views Members on both sides of the House have expressed—namely, that the retention of this punishment is, on the whole, humane in its operation. I have considered the matter in that light. I have considered how far I could go in the direction of the general feeling against the infliction of the punishment; I have considered the circumstances in which the Forces would find themselves from time to time engaged; and I have obtained expression of opinion from those most conversant with the conditions of active service; and I have felt bound to place this Schedule on the Table, containing, as it does, a final record of the opinion of Her Majesty's Government upon the matter: and I am bound to state to the Committee that, as far as in us lies, to the conditions of that Schedule we must adhere.

COLONEL MURE said, he had not had the advantage of hearing the speech of the noble Lord; but he understood he had proposed the addition of a Preamble to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). The noble Lord had spoken of the concessions made by the Government, and, no doubt, they had been many; but long experience in the same country where the campaign was now going on had shown him quite clearly that the acceptance of the limitations of flogging to those crimes mentioned in the Schedule would have the effect of reducing the cases to which the punishment of flogging might be applied so rare and exceptional as to make the flogging clause almost nugatory. If hon. Members had studied the Schedules they would see that the greatest number of crimes there mentioned were crimes that could not possibly arise in South Africa, or were not likely to take place among the troops in Zululand. There were one or two cases under the Schedule where flogging might take the place of the death penalty—for instance, a sentry being asleep or drunk at his post, or leaving his post without being regularly relieved; but these were hardly cases in which summary punishment was specially necessary. As a general rule, the punishment was necessary soon after the troops were landed in a foreign country, more especially a savage country like South Africa. When the regiments were landed from shipboard there was usually some laxity of discipline, and more particularly in hot countries, where marching was very fatiguing and temptations to drinking were almost irresistible; but he was bound to say that if the Bill passed with its present limitations, and if the war was going on at the time when the Bill passed, then, practically speaking, flogging would be done away with in South Africa. Therefore, he asked, would the Government not find themselves in rather a strange position, after having expressed their view that it was necessary, for the discipline of the Army, to maintain the punishment, if further experience showed that they had, practically, abolished flogging even in the field, and under the most pressing emergency? But there was another consideration very strong to his mind, and which he feared must affect the discipline of the Army. We did not enlist a better class of recruits; but those we did enlist had better education than was formerly the case, and these very discussions must have a very bad effect upon the discipline of our troops in Zululand. There was good authority for saying that at least 200 men had been flogged during the campaign. All these discussions the men would read carefully in the newspapers arriving in the Colony, and the debate upon flogging in the House would be the subject of discussion among the men. Owing to the short-service system there was not now the same strict discipline in the Army that there used to be. Our young recruits were no longer mixed with old soldiers confirmed in soldierlike habits, who used to laugh and sneer at discussions about flogging, but were filled with young men and young non-commissioned officers, who were a great deal better educated than their predecessors, and who made the debates upon flogging a constant source of discussion. Every man in Zululand, who had been tried and flogged, knew that a very considerable section of the House of Commons, and perhaps of the public, were disputing the right of officers to punish the rank and file in a certain way, and every soldier who was flogged was looked upon by his associates as more or less of a martyr. He had remarked, in the course of his experience, that officers hated this practice of flogging; and he was bound to say, as a general rule, that those officers who had witnessed the punishment hated it the most; and that those officers who had never been through a campaign, never seen flogging—amateurs, as he might call them—were the sternest disciplinarians, and most anxious to retain flogging in the Army. Experience showed that when a case of this sort came before the House of Commons, and there became, in some sort, a Party question, and from a Party question became a popular question, then they might be certain its knell had sounded. He believed the days of flogging were numbered, and that they ought, free from all recriminations among themselves, to look fairly at the question, and see if offences could not be met with other means of summary punishment. He should like very much to know—with all the facts in view, with these discussions day by day, and the probability of this being made a Party question at the next Election ["Oh, oh!"]—he wished to be understood as deprecating any agitation on the subject out-of-doors—he deprecated the use of this as a Party cry—and if he had anything to do with a Party contest he should allow no words to escape his lips calculated to influence Party feeling—he would like to know whether the military authorities had been consulted as to the effect of the abolition of flogging in South Africa; whether, on the whole, they did not prefer to face any difficulty that might accrue to discipline in the field, to the certain prejudice to discipline which would arise from punishment in the Army being made—as it would be made—a Party question? He would also like to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there was not a time when there was an inclination on the part of Her Majesty's Government to give up flogging altogether? But that their decision not to yield to this inclination was due to the determined attitude of some of their supporters, who had "put their foot down," not in the interests of the Army—not entirely in the interests of discipline—but because the exigencies of Party required it. Having had some experience in this matter he could foresee—and was quite ready to admit—the great difficulties that would arise in the field if flogging were done away with. He knew perfectly well the difficulty of a commander brought face to face with this position in a savage country like Zululand, with only one form of summary punishment to resort to—the dreadful punishment of death. Over and over again it had been reiterated that prisons could be carried about with the Army. At the same time, it must be admitted that in civilized countries, like France and Germany, this difficulty was not so great; but in a country like Zululand, where they could not leave men behind on the line of march, where they must carry all their people with them, he admitted that great difficulty would arise from the restriction to one form of punishment; but, still, he preferred that our commanders should face the difficulty, rather than that discipline generally should be undermined by a popular agitation. Over and over again he had pointed out to the Secretary of State for War the great hardship it was to the good men in the Army that so large a proportion of men of bad character were admitted into the ranks. Every year as many as 2,000 men of admittedly bad character were passed into the Army. Not long ago the following case came under his observation:—He was present at one of our recruiting depôts when a young man who wished to enlist presented himself; the recruiting officer noticed how very short his hair was, and asked the reason. "Oh, Sir," was the reply, "I have just come out of prison." Well, having fulfilled the requirements as to health and size, that man was passed into the ranks without further inquiry. That was the way recruiting was conducted, and 2,000 of such men were admitted into the Army every year. The Committee must understand that when a soldier was spoken of as a bad character, the term meant so utterly bad and disgraceful a fellow that it was almost impossible to train him, and so loathsome that he ought not to associate with others. And yet 2,000 of these were admitted into the British Army year by year; they went from regiment to regiment, contaminating their comrades; and it was due to the presence of these bad characters that it was difficult to maintain discipline in the field, and from this came the necessity for flogging. What would happen if flogging were done away with? There was no doubt in his mind that the consequence would be that during a campaign the people of this country would be horrified and distressed by hearing, from time to time, of men being shot as a punishment. No officer would countenance such a punishment, except under circumstances of dire necessity; but, whenever the news came of a young soldier being shot, a thrill of horror would run through every homestead in the country. As a result of this, people would begin to inquire what sort of men it was they enlisted into the Service; and finding there were so many of a bad character, there would follow the determination on the part of the people that facilities should be offered for obtaining a better class of men in the Army, and that the scandal of the system of enlisting the worst classes should cease. These were the views he wished to express; and, holding them, he had no hesitation in supporting the noble Lord.

COLONEL NORTH expressed his great astonishment at the speech of the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down. He did not know whether it was the pressure of constituents, or the pressure of Party, that had been brought to bear on the hon. and gallant Member; but this he did know—that if there was a Member of the House with whom, more than another, he had spoken on the subject of flogging, it was the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He (Colonel North) could only say that a short time ago the hon. and gallant Member's opinion was that it was utterly impossible to maintain discipline in an Army in the field unless officers had the power to inflict corporal punishment. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had argued against himself. He had confined himself to the Zulu campaign, and he had shown it was impossible to take everybody about with the Army on the march. Then it followed that if they did not flog an offender he must be shot, and left behind. Another point was this—a man might commit some very grievous offence, but yet not such as would merit death. What, then, was to be done with him? The hon. and gallant Gentleman talked a good deal about the blackguards in the Army; and for a long time it had been the endeavour of all to improve the condition of the Army, and get into it men of a respectable class. But how was this to be done? A respectable man might have on either side of him soldiers of very bad character. They had no old soldiers and non-commissioned officers, and these last were the backbone of the Army; and those and the old soldiers maintained the esprit de corps. But, deprived of these, and deprived of the only means of keeping the blackguards in order, how was it possible for a commander to preserve discipline? He could only say he was lost in astonishment that the hon. and gallant Gentleman, with his experience, did not see the necessity of this.

MR. WALTER hoped the Committee would excuse him if he, as a civilian, said a few words on the subject now under consideration. He was one of those who hitherto had supported the punishment of flogging, though he was glad to find it had been limited in amount, so that, though still severe, it was comparatively small to what it was. The question was now presented to the country in a totally new aspect, and in an aspect in which it had never been presented to the country before—not as being in itself the best and most appropriate punishment which could be devised for any particular offence, but simply as a mitigation of a severer punishment—a substitution for the punishment of death. That circumstance, in itself, opened a new view of the question, and was worthy of the most serious discussion. He felt himself hardly competent to enter into it without much further consideration; but it presented an entirely new aspect of the punishment of flogging, and raised the question whether, supposing that punishment to be only a substitution or commutation for death, it was, in fact, the only possible substitute which could be adopted for that extreme penalty?

This was not, however, exactly the point of view in which it most forcibly struck him at this moment. When they discussed this question among themselves, they were struck at once by the difference which existed between their Army and the great Armies on the Continent. They could not help being struck by the fact that, somehow or other, the penalty of flogging was known only in the British Army. It was unknown in the Army of France, which had achieved such wonderful military feats, and it was also unknown to the still greater Army of Germany, which had lately performed the greatest campaign which the world ever saw. They were told that the punishment of flogging must be retained because the materials of their Army were of a different character from the materials of the Armies of France and Germany. He did not wish to use an offensive or a disparaging expression in remarking that their Army was not recruited from a very high class of the population. Surely this question ought to present itself to them when they were taking this fact into account. They professed themselves unable to get on without this formidable punishment; but ought not this to suggest to them the imperative necessity of looking the greater question in the face, and of seeing whether the British nation could not place its Army on such a footing as would enable it to dispense with the punishment of flogging? For his own part, he believed that it could. At the present moment, whether from the plans of the late Government, or those who had carried those plans into effect, the Army was in a most miserable condition. There were two ways by which a great Army might be recruited. There was the mode in which foreign Armies were created—namely, by conscription. No one could suppose that in an Army thus created the punishment of flogging could exist for a week. Then there was another way, which, at one time, he confessed he hoped might have been adopted. It had always been his favourite scheme in opposition to that which was adopted by the late Government—namely, having a corps d'élite of 40,000 or 50,000 men, equal in character and in stature to the Metropolitan Police or to the army of railway servants. Such a corps would, man for man, be superior to any equal number of men they might have to encounter, and the Army might be recruited from the Militia, which would be made a really powerful Force. His belief was that in such a corps they would not have flogging any more than there was flogging in the Metropolitan Police. But with their miserable system of recruiting men—or, rather, boys of 17 years of age—whom nobody else would have, they were obliged to persist in a deplorable system of punishment repudiated by every other Army in the world. This was the view he took; and he hoped this discussion—without regard to quality, by far the gravest that had been raised in connection with the Mutiny Bill—would have the effect of turning the attention of the Government to the subject of the character of the men in the Army.

MR. A. GATHORNE-HARDY ventured to think the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walter) had begun at the wrong end. The hon. Gentleman had suggested that, by a better system, they might secure a better stamp of recruits, and possibly he was quite correct; but now the question was how to deal with the material they had got? It had been admitted, by the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), and by the hon. Member for Berkshire and others, that soldiers at present were not of the stamp it was hoped might some time be obtained; but, then, what was to be done to preserve discipline among the men they had? The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Renfrewshire, having been called upon by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) to come forward and curse his enemies, had, like a second Balaam, ended by blessing them. With the exception of the beginning and the end, the speech of the hon. and gallant Member was a powerful argument in favour of retaining the punishment of flogging in the Army. He was obliged to admit that the abolition of the punishment would leave only the death penalty; and he decided that, under present circumstances, the more severe penalty would have to be inflicted in some, if not in many, cases. This was the great argument which, in listening to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), most powerfully convinced him of the necessity of retaining the punishment. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had also alluded to the bad effect on the discipline of the men these discussions would have. With this remark, he (Mr. A. Gathorne Hardy) concurred; but it suggested itself to his mind why, if hon. Gentlemen thought that, did they carry on the discussions with such length and such persistency? With reference to the change of front on the part of the noble Lord and hon. Gentlemen opposite, he might remark that they had declared their intention of supporting the abolition of the penalty, giving as their reasons the concessions already made by the Government. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford—who, no doubt, was numbered among the supporters of the noble Lord—was largely responsible, with others on the same side, for the concessions upon which they now based their change of front. The reduction of the number of lashes to 25 had the support of the hon. and learned Member, the addition of the Schedules also; and it was on these concessions that the change of front was largely based. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT dissented.] The hon. and learned Gentleman shook his head; but it was impossible to find upon what else the change was based. The argument used by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford had never been answered. If this penalty was abolished, nothing was left but the penalty of death; and that was an argument in favour of the humanity of those supporting the Government. They were reduced to these two alternatives—the lash and the bullet. Members on the other side said, adopt the bullet; on the other hand the Government said, use the lash. Surely the latter were the real friends of humanity.

MR. MUNDELLA, as to the claim put forward by hon. Members opposite to be considered the friends of humanity, would like to ask the Secretary of State for War if he had made any inquiry into the working of the Code in the German Army, and if he was prepared to say how that Code worked; and then he would ask why it was that English soldiers were assumed to be so different to those of Continental Armies? He was assured, on the highest military authority, that in the Austro-German War not a single German soldier was shot as a punishment. It was said there was no alternative between the lash and the bullet; but here was an Army in which the lash was unknown, and they had not required to use the bullet.

Mr. Walter

What was the reason for this? Again, in the Franco-German War, only one or two out of the whole German Army suffered the death punishment—out of 600,000 or 800,000 men in the field, with every temptation to marauding and crime. But the answer was, there was a different class of men in a conscription Army; and the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho) had accused those who argued for the abolition of flogging, of casting their sympathies in with the ruffians in the Army; but surely this ruffianism must exist in a conscripted Army, and there was a necessity for keeping discipline. But were they likely to have more or less ruffianism while this system of flogging was in existence? He had seen men coming from the mine and the loom to stand side by side with bankers' clerks and men of good education, and surely that was a case in which the argument of his hon. Friend would have applied. Why, then, had they heard nothing of this system in the German Army? Our authorities had copied, in the most slavish manner, the German system. They had copied the German Army, in fact, in everything but its discipline. Did not the right hon. and gallant Gentleman know that the German Military Code was the most humane in Europe. But there was something more to be said. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) said there was only that kind of punishment that could be resorted to for particular offences. Was there such a poverty of invention in England, that but one sort of punishment could be resorted to? Again, he would ask the Committee whether, if this same punishment were inflicted on any animal in the creation, under any circumstances whatever, whether the man who inflicted it would not make himself amenable to our criminal law? He believed the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) had originated a very useful discussion by the line he had taken—that they would have to look more to the character of the men who enlisted in the Army. If the military authorities would pay a little more regard to character, and trust a little less in the lash, we should have not only a much better class of soldiers, but a much better Army. Instead of retaining flogging only in time of war, it seemed to him that if it were to be retained at all, it must be retained in a time of peace; for, according to the argument of the gallant Officers opposite, it was the only mode of bringing men into proper discipline. He, for one, should now vote for the abolition of the cat under all circumstances, because he believed they could devise other punishments much more effective, and much more likely to reform the Service; while, at the same time, they would get a better Army, and raise the character of the men of England.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, it was high time to come to a decision. He quite agreed with those who thought it was unfortunate this discussion should be so protracted. Even hon. Gentlemen opposite, who had at heart the abolition of this punishment, must think it due to the soldier himself that this discussion should cease; that they should have an absolute decision upon the merits of the case; and that they should not, on every occasion when it could be brought before the Committee, raise again and again and afresh this question of flogging. He had been very much struck with the debate to-day. He was not going to accuse the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, or those who acted with him, of doing what they did not believe to be absolutely right; but the noble Lord, in his speech, had declared that there were certain cases in which flogging ought to be used. The noble Lord proposed that there should be an amendment in the Preamble, and that they should define absolutely and distinctly those cases in which flogging ought to be employed. He knew that many had changed their minds; but, even at the eleventh hour, the noble Lord still thought there were reasons why a General of an Army in the field should have that power. Putting aside all other feelings, what the Committee had to consider was, what would be for the best interests of an Army in the field. When he heard the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) say that in no other Army were there punishments like those in the English Army, his answer was that the English Army was far more just and equitable and humane to its soldiers than any other Army the hon. Gentleman could name. He knew the Code of the German Army, and what was done in it; and he defied the hon. Gentleman to get up and say that what individual officers did to their men in the German

Army—and it was the same in the French Army—would not be considered in this country discreditable and disgraceful, and would not for one moment be allowed? The hon. Member shook his head; but it was an absolute fact. No later than last week he saw that an officer in a foreign Army was tried and condemned to five years' imprisonment in a fortress for violently assaulting and brutally ill-treating soldiers under his command on 66 different occasions. How? With his fist and with his sword. That was certainly a punishment well deserved; and he would ask, in justice and fairness, whether it was not a fact that there was not an English officer who did not dislike, and would be the last to punish his men, and who did not always avoid it, unless it was absolutely impossible to get on without it? A statement was made the other day about the 1st Dragoon Guards, when they embarked for Zululand. It was said they had a number of men flogged. He had made inquiry about that at Aldershot, and he ascertained that three men were flogged for the grossest insubordination. They were men who had volunteered from another regiment and had been transferred to the regiment, and they were flogged for forcing a sentry, and endeavouring to strike their officer who was on duty. What could they do with men like that, cooped up on board ship, and having their arms with them, unless there were some such means as flogging as a punishment for such misconduct? The suggestion that men should be tried by court martial and imprisoned would, in case of war, throw all the work upon their comrades, and would, besides, be just the thing the men would like. Every general officer he had seen—and they were bound to pay attention to their opinion—said that it was imperatively necessary in an enemy's country that they should have this punishment. The Committee had fenced flogging round in every way; and was it not more merciful to condemn a man to this punishment than, as in foreign countries, to five years' hard labour in chains? They might depend upon it, men would rather be flogged than go to prison for two years. He only wished the punishment could be done away with. But, now that the noble Lord had raised the discussion, he hoped he would agree that it was time to come to an absolute decision. He hoped hon. Members opposite, who said they did not want to put off the decision, would be bound by the majority, as those on that (the Ministerial) side would be bound, if the majority were against them.

MR. MUNDELLA said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down had challenged him to say whether the officers of the French and German Armies did not treat their men in a way which, in England, would be considered disgraceful, and would not be tolerated? He would only reply that such conduct was clearly contrary to the Codes of both the French and the German Armies, and was also punishable under the Military Code. That was one of the questions he inquired into only the day before; and other hon. Members, who were acquainted with the working of the Code, could corroborate him.

MR. J. HOLMS said, the discussion had opened up important considerations in relation to the whole condition of their Army. ["Oh!"] It was asked whether they were to change their system, or to deal with the material in their hands? They had now a Departmental Committee to investigate the condition of the Army, and surely, therefore, this was a proper time for them to consider the laws which governed it. He could not agree that, generally, German officers treated their men badly; and the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had defeated his own argument by quoting an instance where a German officer was sentenced to severe punishment for doing so. He had read, with the greatest care, the whole of the German Code, and he had visited Germany more than once; and he would not hesitate to say that if the cat-o'-nine-tails were adopted there, there would very quickly be a revolution in the country. It was said we must have the cat, because there were so many bad men in the Army. Well, he had always maintained that the way to get good men into the Army was to do away with the cat. Until it was abolished, it was certain that good men would not join the Army. The House had reason to complain that the Government had not had the question investigated by the Committee upstairs, for it could have been better considered there than it could be discussed here. The punishment was doomed, and the Government could only do harm by standing out. He deprecated this being made the subject of popular agitation.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE stated, that in Germany a different class of men served in the ranks to that from which the English Army was mainly recruited. He supposed the Opposition did not mean to claim a monopoly of humanity; and he asked them whether they would not give credit to the other side of the House for being anxious to do away with flogging, if that were possible? It would be well to look at the matter from an historical point of view, and to consider who had inflicted the severest punishments when they had the power. There never was more flogging than there was during the Mutiny at the Nore. He would remind the Committee that the French soldiers were different from our men, because many of those who had begun as private soldiers had risen to be Marshals. But, in England, we had an entirely different class of men to deal with; and though he would not call them blackguards, he did think that our soldiers were a class not to be controlled except by severe punishments. The Governor of Newgate had told him that the terror of flogging was so great that, if it superseded hanging, it would, he believed, do more than that punishment to deter people from committing murder. If flogging were prohibited, then, certainly, the authorities would be obliged sometimes to take away life, which otherwise could be spared for the service of the country.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN observed, that those who charged him and his hon. Friends with a change of front in this matter forgot the educating influence of the debate. No one who had listened to the speech of the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington), and the debate which followed, would doubt that in the English Army the lash was, practically, dead. It had been dying by inches for the last month. It had been abolished in many cases, in which it was said that it was necessary in order to make discipline effective; and, as they had cut off so many inches from the "cats" tail, had they not better now get rid of it altogether? They had been told that flogging was necessary in order that men might not be shot; but a large proportion of the offences in the Schedule were so heinous, that death was a proper punishment for them. He would, for instance, shoot a man who went over to the enemy, or who gave information to them; while the rest of the offences were so trivial that they never ought to be punished with death. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had asked him not to claim a monopoly of humanity. But if they did not claim a monopoly of humanity, the other side, also, should not claim a monopoly of sincerity. Why should this be made a Party question? There was nothing Party about it. He only regretted that Mr. Henley was not with them, to give them the benefit of his strong common sense on this question. How did other Armies maintain their discipline? No one would say that the German commanding officers were not the supreme authority in military matters; yet they had no flogging, nor anything of the kind.

"Oh! would the gods the giftie gie us,
To see ourselves as others see us."

He wished hon. Members could talk to French, German, and Italian officers on the subject, and not maintain the spirit of insular patriotism in which they had addressed the House. He could not understand why they should act in the spirit of the song—"He resisted all temptations to belong to other nations," and remained an Englishman. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, like the ostrich, insisted upon burying their heads in the sand, and not caring how much of the rest of their persons they exposed to view. They were told that the German Army was composed of respectable men. Well, he should have thought, as ours was a popular Army, that that would have been the strongest argument in favour of doing away with the lash. He need not refer further, however, to Continental Armies, for he had recently seen a gentleman who held a high position in the Army of the United States during the last war. That Army was recruited by voluntary enlistment, like ours, as everybody knew; yet when he asked if the lash was in use there that gentleman seemed astonished, and replied at once that public opinion would not tolerate it for a moment. He added—what every foreigner with whom he had talked on this subject said also—that he could not make out how it was that public opinion tolerated it here.. He repeated—what he had been told over and over again during these debates—that our soldiers were such a lot of blackguards that they could not otherwise be controlled. The reply was—

“If you come to that, I think we could show you some blackguards in our Army as great as yours; but, then, if we flogged them, we should have far greater blackguards.”

He would also call a witness who was entirely unprejudiced—the editor of The Pall Mall Gazette. That paper had been almost the apostle of the lash, and seemed to think that the world could only be regenerated by corporal punishment. Yet, in that paper, a letter had appeared that morning from a recruiting officer, stating that the lash did have one bad effect—it deterred respectable men from joining the Army. He did not wish this to be made a Party question, and he hoped it would never be made one; and if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would give up the punishment, he would cheerfully make him a present of the personal popularity which would certainly result from his having the courage to come forward and remove this stigma from the English Army and the English nation.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, in justice to himself and duty to his constituents, he must state the reasons for his vote on this subject. He hated the punishment of flogging as much as hon. Gentlemen opposite. The question was, whether it was unavoidable? This punishment could only be justified if it could be shown that it was absolutely necessary. They were told, by the highest military authorities in this country, that it was necessary, and it was not for him, as a civilian, to contradict them. These were experts, to whose opinion he must pay the greatest deference; and he, for one, must accept it. When he was asked why flogging was not inflicted on the Continent, he could only reply that he should like to know a little more on the subject; but he believed that Continental officers did make use of their canes, and the flat of their swords, pretty freely. Again, he was quite certain that shooting was more general in foreign countries than in England. Men, who assaulted a sentinel or an officer, even in time of peace, would be shot. [“No, no!”] He asserted that unhesitatingly. And then he had seen a French soldier placed in the middle of a square of troops, stripped of his uniform, knocked down by a blow on the side of the head which almost rendered him insensible, and then walked round the square with a heavy weight attached to his leg, and off to prison. That was a very severe and degrading punishment. No doubt, flogging was degrading; but he thought there was one thing more degrading than flogging, and that was crime. For degrading crimes they must inflict degrading punishments. In France crimes were punished by the galley, which, in this country, would be punished by the lash. The criminals were dressed in a peculiar dress, with a number on it, and they had heavy chains on their legs. At night they slept in rooms, with other men like themselves, all fastened in rows to an iron rod, and were subject, in fact, to a species of slavery. Hon. Gentlemen, if they saw anything of that, and knew anything of that punishment, would certainly agree that it was quite as degrading as the lash. Most soldiers would rather receive a certain number of lashes and have done with it. Then, again, other Armies were conscription Armies, which resulted in great injury to commerce and trade, by taking the men away from their civil employments. It would be an evil day in this House when they adopted conscription, and he hoped no one would advocate it. The hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) wanted an Army of picked men; but, if his views were carried out, they must incur an expense which would alarm the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He believed that flogging would only be inflicted in case of absolute necessity, and where the only alternative would be shooting; and, surely, it was better to flog than to take a man's life. It was quite clear that when men were on foreign service, or fighting in the field, the only possible alternatives were the lash or death. If anyone would convince him that the lash was unnecessary, he would vote for its total abolition; but he did think it was clear that it was absolutely necessary, as, otherwise, they might find themselves at the mercy of a few ruffians banded together.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am very sensible of the great importance and the great difficulty of this question. At the same time, I am under the influence of a very sincere desire to promote a reasonable expedition in our dealing with it. So far as the merits of the question are concerned, my own views have been so closely expressed by my noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition that I am very willing either to postpone it altogether, or simply to make such observations as have been suggested to me by the course of this debate. I observe that we are in an unfortunate predicament—that after lamenting the loss of a good deal of time upon the Bill, and after we have even charged upon certain Members a good deal of the responsibility for that loss, that we are ourselves pursuing a discussion of a subject of very great moment on the occasion of a Question from the Chair, the decision of which cannot advance us one step. I do think, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government may very fairly appeal to the Committee to bring the present discussion to a close. It has, undoubtedly, been of great use, inasmuch as it has clearly exhibited the views of my noble Friend and many others who have taken an interest in this question. It remains to be considered in what manner those different views which have been expressed are to be brought to an issue. What is quite plain is, that they cannot be brought to an issue on the Motion of my hon. Friend (Sir George Campbell). There are two methods which are open to us—we may proceed with the Amendments on the Paper, and then arrive at the Schedule; and then it would be possible for those who are prepared, with my noble Friend, to vote for the abolition of flogging, to give their negative votes on the Schedule as a whole, with the effect that flogging would be practically abolished. It would be abolished, however, in a manner informal and irregular; but there would still remain in the Bill a clause referring to the Schedule, and giving sanction to the principle of corporal punishment, and referring to the Schedule specifying the mode and the conditions of its infliction. I own, therefore, Sir, it appears to me that the more regular course would be, as the Committee has affirmed the principle of flogging in one of the clauses, that they should await a Report, in order to raise the question in a regular manner by some Amendment framed for that purpose, or, by a negative upon the clause, we might arrive at a perfectly distinct issue, and we should then be able to proceed to-night with the Amendment in detail. I must also observe that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, when he discussed the suggestion that has been made by my noble Friend as to an indication in the Bill itself of the mind of Parliament with regard to the reduction of flogging to the alternative described as the lash or the bullet, although he did not give any encouragement to that suggestion, and said that the balance of his mind was at present against it, yet I did not understand him to use such positive language as to entirely preclude himself from considering whether he could adopt such a course. Whether he has closed his mind or not I do not know, of course; but I regard it as a point of importance with regard to the matter in issue. However that may be, it appears to me that time—which is always a precious commodity—has become, under present circumstances, far more valuable than ever; and I think we should very greatly save time, if we could bring to an issue the present discussion on the Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend behind me (Sir George Campbell), and then proceed in a regular manner upon the Report to a decision on the main question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I most fully concur with what has fallen from my right hon. Friend. I must, however, point out that the discussion we have recently been going through was initiated by the noble Lord, and initiated deliberately with the consciousness that this particular clause, and this particular Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), was not a very convenient one on which to raise the question. The noble Lord, no doubt, had a reason for what he said, and thought it desirable he should take an early opportunity of declaring to the Committee the views which he and others whom he represents have now formed upon the general question. I do think it is, at all events, an advantage that we should at this time be furnished with that statement; though, of course, such observations as those he made necessarily led to a good deal of discussion on the general question. That discussion has ranged over several topics. I had intended to make some observations on several things which had been said; but I do feel so strongly the justice of what has been said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich that I will abstain from making any comment upon what has been said for the sake of going on with the Bill, and discussing the various Amendments now before the Committee, in the expectation that we shall have an opportunity, later on, of regularly debating this question. I shall then be able to state both the grounds upon which we proceed, and the arguments by which we think our course may be justified. I hope other hon. Members will take it up, and that we shall now proceed with the question before the Committee.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, this question had been very fully discussed in the course of the present debate, especially upon the very important statement made, almost at its commencement, by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition. He need scarcely say with how much pleasure and gratification he, and those who worked with him, had heard that statement. He believed that it must materially affect the course which he proposed to take in reference to the Bill in its present stage. That statement was very important; but not less important was the statement by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, in which he most fairly, but, at the same time, most emphatically, admitted that on the Government, and on the Government alone, must fall the responsibility of retaining the flogging clauses in the Bill. That had not been quite clear to him and his Friends before. Some of them thought—and it had, indeed, been said in the course of the debate—that the Government desired to remove this punishment from the Bill, but that they were overborne by certain high military authorities outside. He was of opinion that that statement was without any real foundation; and, at all events, he was glad to find that the Government were prepared to take the onus upon themselves, and on them, and on their supporters, must the responsibility and the odium of preserving this barbarous and disgraceful punishment rest. They themselves, by their action, had cut away the only grounds upon which the maintenance of the lash in the Army could be really and properly defended. Perhaps hon. Members opposite were not aware of the full extent of the changes that had been made in this Bill. It was all very well for the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) to get up and declare that the discipline of the Army absolutely depended on the retention of these flogging clauses. What was the illustration by which he proved that? The hon. and gallant Gentleman certainly did not give the Committee a very good opinion of the British Army, for he spoke of a good soldier finding on his right hand a tremendous ruffian, and on the other the refuse of all the gaols in the Kingdom. But what were the offences which the hon. and gallant Member anticipated the men were going to commit? If they were offences within the cognizance of the civil power they did not want to flog them for it; while, if they were committing trivial offences against military discipline, flogging could not be inflicted as a punishment after the recent alterations made in the Bill. Up to the present time flogging had been chiefly inflicted for trivial offences, for offences against discipline, and, above all, for drunkenness in presence of the enemy. For such offences, and especially for drunkenness, flogging could not any longer be inflicted in consequence of the Amendments the Government had accepted. Then, he declared that they could no longer say that flogging was necessary for the discipline of the Army. What did the military papers say on the subject? The United Service Gazette, a paper written by military men for military men, in the last number, published July 12, said—

“It would be wise for the Government now to yield to what is undoubtedly the genuine public opinion, and kill the cat for ever. There are many punishments which can be substituted for it on board ship and in quarters, and even in the field it is not an absolute necessity that the punishment of death should be the only alternative.”

That was the opinion of a paper which had been in favour of the punishment, but now thought it was no longer worth retaining. The writer went on—

“Let the Government be wise, and take time by the forelock; let them boldly announce that the lash is done away with in the Army and the Navy. It is worth the trial.”

As a sentiment the experiment was worth trial, for this was virtually an appeal to the soldiers and sailors to uphold the dignity of their order, and to maintain that discipline which had hitherto made them invincible. Such an appeal would not be made in vain. He might also quote similar opinions from The Army and Navy Gazette, written while these debates were proceeding; but there was enough to prove he had the support of high military authority. He now had to consider what course should be taken with reference to the Amendments standing in his name. All these Amendments were practically intended for the limitation of this already limited punishment; but it did seem to him illogical and inconsistent to propose limitations when, in a short time, they were going to discuss the propriety of abolishing the lash altogether; and, under these circumstances, he would withdraw his Amendments from the Paper in the present stage of the Bill, and would offer no further opposition in Committee, reserving his objections till they discussed the main question, when the whole Liberal Party would undoubtedly declare against the continued retention of this degrading punishment.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that when he was at the University of Bonn his rooms overlooked the drill ground, and he had seen the sergeants and officers in a Cavalry regiment use their canes very freely on the backs of their men. ["When?"] That was when he was a student there. [MR. SULLIVAN: That was 80 years ago.] He believed it was in 1836. Again, in the Mediterranean—about the year 1846—he saw a sailor crucified—his arms and legs were stretched out and fastened in the rigging. The man was kept suspended there for a whole day, in the burning sun, without water; and he was told that the punishment was given for some breach of discipline. That was on board a French line of battle ship.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the Amendment he had proposed had rather been lost sight of in the discussion initiated by the noble Lord. His enthusiasm for his Leader had been so much excited of late that he was now glad to follow not only when he thought him right, but even sometimes when he thought him wrong. As, however, he had previously committed himself to his Amendment and to an opinion adverse to the plan recommended by the noble Lord, he was obliged to stand by it. If the Government would not accept it, then he might feel himself free to vote against the punishment of flogging altogether. He was very anxious to see the Army composed of respectable men; but then it must be remembered that they could only obtain these men by paying for them, and that the cost would be very heavy.

MR. SULLIVAN said, the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) had endeavoured to prejudice them by stories of what occurred when he was at school at Bonn; but they did not want to know what had happened between 60 and 70 years ago. He would remind the hon. Member, in the words of his noble Leader, Lord Beaconsfield, that a great many things had happened since then; and if he would inquire he would find there had been a great improvement in the German Army. As to the position this question now occupied before the House, he understood the suggestion had been made that his hon. Friends should withdraw all their Amendments from discussion in Committee, and have one set battle on the Report. That might be a very convenient course for the Government; but he should hesitate about accepting it. He noticed in the accounts of an engagement between a Peruvian iron-clad and a Chilean wooden vessel, the iron-clad wanted the wooden vessel to come out and fight a grand match and settle at once and for ever; but the wooden vessel did not see the plausibility of that proposal; so the minority could not be decoyed from their vantage ground in Committee by any such amiable invitation as had been addressed to them from across the floor. He (Mr. Sullivan) felt that he and his hon. Friends had an advantage in Committee which they would not have on Report. And it was by making use of that advantage that the admirable concessions of the Government had been gained. If they were only allowed to remain in Committee three or four days longer, he could not doubt that, from the kindly desire of Her Majesty's Government to do what was right for the efficiency of the Army, they would accomplish a full measure of reform by abolishing the degradation of the cat. He informed the Committee fairly that he was determined to take a Division upon every conceivable Amendment which he could raise in Committee, because he should have an advantage there which he would not have on Report. He wanted that punishment should be visited on the offenders in crime irrespective of persons, and the result of the Division would show whether it was the crime or the class of the offender that was aimed at.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, of course, the hon. and learned Member for Louth is perfectly entitled to take whatever course he thinks proper, and no one, I believe, would have the presumption to offer to him, or any hon. Members below the Gangway, advice as to the course which they should pursue. I cannot but think, however, that the arrangement suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and assented to by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, is the most convenient course that could be adopted—namely, that the decisive Division on this question should be postponed until Report. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) intimated that, as far as he was concerned, he did not propose to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, and would, therefore, assist in passing the Bill through Committee this evening. I cannot help thinking it would be very convenient, if possible, that that arrangement should be carried out. Of course, it is desirable that we should, before discussing the Amendments in the way proposed, have some understanding as to when the Report would be taken. All I can do to assist in this matter is to say that we do not propose to take any part in the discussion upon these subordinate issues, but to wait until the House has an opportunity of deciding upon the main question.

MR. BIGGAR said, before the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy was withdrawn, he might be permitted to offer a few remarks on what he believed to be the general position of affairs. The object being to secure the abolition of flogging, it appeared to him that the front Opposition Bench was not taking the most desirable course in order to secure that end. The position of the matter was this—there were a number of Amendments on the Paper, each one of which was directed, more or less, to the principle of flogging. They knew the Government would not agree to all those Amendments; but it was quite possible they would agree to some of them, and the principle would in that way be more or less curtailed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich and the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs had proposed that the right to place these Amendments before the House should be waived, and that hon. Members should wait until the Bill had reached its final stage, when the whole question was to be settled by a sham fight and a Party Division. The result of that would be that the noble Lord, who had voted in favour of flogging on several stages of the Bill, would gain the credit of having made a Motion for its abolition. In that case, the whole odium of its retention would rest upon the Government, and the Opposition would simply be fighting in favour of a foregone conclusion. He (Mr. Biggar) would certainly not recommend any such course. It was well known that the great body of electors in the large towns was against this punishment; and the Gentlemen on the front Opposition Benches, looking to this fact, cared not one straw for the interest of the Army, or of the soldier, but were simply fighting in the interest of Party. He would suggest to Her Majesty's Government that the best way to take the wind out of the sails of the noble Lord would be to propose, on Report, that the clause giving the power of flogging should be struck out of the Bill. He did not agree with the proposal that hon. Members should not move Amendments which they believed would go in the direction of lessening this punishment, neither did he approve the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord coming forward, at the eleventh hour, when the battle had been fought out to the bitter end, and trying to make some political capital out of it.

SIR ROBERT PEEL could not but think that Her Majesty's Government had been placed in a position of some embarrassment by the course which had been taken by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition. It would, he thought, have been better if the noble Lord had given Notice of his intended suggestion, in order that the Government and the Committee might have been fully prepared to deal with it. He was bound to say that after the concessions made by the Government, he, for one, in common with many others, were prepared to accept these concessions as final; and he would remind the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) that when, on a former day, the Secretary of State for War had made his statement that he intended to confine the punishment of flogging to cases in which sentences of death could be awarded, he expressed his entire concurrence with the course which the Government had taken. He was sorry that this movement had been made now. It certainly had the appearance of a Party movement. It was all very well to disclaim such an intention on either side; but it was quite evident that this sudden change of front had been taken after the noble Lord and his Friends had seen which way the cat jumped. Those who had been fighting this Bill, clause by clause, were really entitled to the credit of the suggestion which had been made. He was bound, in candour, to admit, after the admission of the Secretary of State for War, wherein he distinctly told Parliament that, in his opinion, and in the opinion of the military authorities of the country, it was impossible to maintain the discipline of the Army unless the Schedule which had been submitted by the Government were adopted by the Committee—namely, that flogging should be resorted to in cases punishable by death—that he, for one, was prepared to bow to that decision. There was great force and weight in that decision. They had obtained great concessions; and he thought it would be unfair to the Committee that the question should now be made one of Party, for the purpose of gratifying a few right hon. Gentlemen who sat upon the front Opposition Bench, and who would now get to themselves all the credit for concessions which had been gained by the strenuous exertions of those who sat below the Gangway. After having heard the statement of the Secretary of State for War, that the discipline of the Army could not be maintained without recourse to flogging in cases punishable with death, he should feel very great reluctance to vote against the Government upon this question.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) contained an unexpected vindication of the course of persistent opposition to certain clauses of the Bill which had been followed by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on his side of the House. He certainly congratulated his hon. Friends upon the triumph they had achieved. But he was at a loss to understand whether the proposal which was made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and the noble Lord the Member for Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington), had been made with the object of abolishing flogging in the Army, or for the purpose of re-uniting the Liberal Party. He sympathized with both those objects; but thought that the abolition of flogging in the Army was the more important of the two. He had no doubt that by some unaccountable arrangement the Liberal Party would be united whenever they had the opportunity of vindicating their principles on the hustings; but he did not see any such immediate necessity for that close union during the next four or five weeks' of Parliament as should preclude discussion upon Amendments on the Paper. Nevertheless, when a spirit of conciliation was shown in any quarter of the House, he thought it should be met in a similar spirit; and if there was now a spirit of conciliation abroad, he was quite prepared to go abroad and meet it. But he had not been able to understand what quid pro quo his hon. Friends were to receive from the Government for the withdrawal of their Amendments. Was it that Her Majesty's Government, supposing that the Amendments were withdrawn, were ready to take Report on Wednesday or Thursday next, at such an hour as would give hon. Members an opportunity of debating the question of flogging over again? He was not aware that the Government had made any such proposal; and if they abandoned the vantage ground which they now possessed in Committee, he wanted to know what equivalent the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition or the Secretary of State for War was prepared to give them for that abandonment on their part? He hoped that it would not be forgotten that anything which had been achieved in the direction of reform had not been achieved by what were called great debates, nor by sham battles. His hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had described them when the Front Benches, in all the panoply and pomp of war, crossed swords across the Table. He had always thought that that sort of thing—making a Parliamentary advertisement on one side for the defenders of the Constitution, and on the other for the Gentlemen who, for the moment, were vindicating the liberties of the people—was not the way to secure success. There was no result. If hon. Members wanted any result, they must be prepared to do the odious work of walking into the Lobbies in a miserable minority, perhaps over and over again, and thus making an impression on those charged with the Business of the country. How were they treated when they were engaged in that odious task? Nothing but denunciations had proceeded from some of the most prominent Members of the front Opposition Bench. He excepted from that indictment the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), who had assisted them upon some very important points in their proceedings, and to whom, probably, were due most of the reforms which Her Majesty's Government had accepted with reference to this Bill. In order to bring the matter to a harmonious conclusion, he would appeal to Her Majesty's Government to show what equivalent they were prepared to offer for the withdrawal of the Amendments.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I did not understand the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) to be anything in the nature of a proposal for any bargain or arrangement for giving a quid pro quo. On the other hand, the Government feel that it would be their duty, under the circumstances of the case, to place the Report of the Bill as a first Order of the Day on Thursday next, if we can get it through Committee to-night. I understand that if the debate in Committee is concluded by a reasonable hour this evening, the Bill, as amended, is so far advanced in reprinting that it would be in the hands of Members early enough for them to examine it between to-morrow morning and Thursday, when we propose to take it as a first Order of the Day. I understand my right hon. Friend and the noble Lord both to say that it would be more convenient to have a discussion, in some form or other, upon the question which would raise a distinct issue, and that the clause before us does not admit of raising a distinct issue between those who wish to abolish flogging and those who wish to retain it. My right hon. Friend has suggested that the proper and most convenient arrangement would be to move an Amendment on Report; and I need only say that we are anxious to give every facility for a full discussion of what we all feel to be an exceedingly important question.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT pointed out that the Committee having passed the 44th clause, which enacted that there should be corporal punishment, it could not then be modified by taking any Division as to whether there should be corporal punishment or not. Such an issue could only be raised on Report; and it appeared to him desirable to bring the matter to that stage as early as possible. No doubt, many hon. Members wanted a Division at once; but that was impossible. What would be the advantage of taking a discussion upon a number of side issues and Amendments? They wished to persuade the country that the issue was an important and substantial one, and not raised for the purpose of delaying the progress of the Bill. He thought it would be best to allow the Bill to pass through Committee as rapidly as was consistent with the discussion of material matters. From any point of view this appeared the most desirable course, because they could not get any control over the Bill until they could control the 44th clause.

MR. OTWAY desired to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) whether he was right in his assumption that the question of corporal punishment could not be raised until the Report of the Bill was before the House, because it seemed to him that it could be very well raised on the Schedule? He wished to present the spirit of conciliation which had been so general in the House, and was quite willing to reserve any observations that he had to make for a future occasion. He rose, therefore, solely with the object of asking whether the hon. and learned Gentleman was correct in assuming that the question could not be raised before Report?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, nothing could be done in Committee which would remove from Clause 44 the words—"Corporal punishment may be inflicted for offences punishable under this Act." What was the use of taking a Division on side issues, when they were within two days of the Report? The course which had been suggested seemed to him to be the more Parliamentary and expedient course.

MR. PARNELL was not prepared to say whether it would be advisable to continue a course of persistent opposition on the question of flogging. He thought, however, there was a good deal of force in the observations of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), when he asked the Government for something in return for the abandonment of the Amendments at this stage of the Bill. It would be manifest to the Government that they would not be in a position to have the Report stage on Thursday; and he would suggest that it would be a great advantage to have an opportunity of calmly considering the whole question until the following Monday, when the Report might be finished. If the Government would agree to this, he should be justified in abandoning until then the position which he had taken in Committee upon this flogging question, and the Bill would undoubtedly go through Committee that evening.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must remind the Committee that this particular question of flogging is one which has been so very much before the minds of hon. Members during a considerable time that there ought not to be any difficulty in preparing for the discussion on Thursday. The circumstances as to the pressure of time are so well known that I will not refer to them again; but it must be remembered that the present Act expires on the 25th instant, and that the present Bill has to go to the House of Lords, where it would be hardly decent to expect that the noble Lords interested in the matter should pass it without making some observations upon it.

MR. SULLIVAN felt he could speak for the hon. Members round about him, and say that it was their desire that this Bill should not be lost. The request of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was in no sense made with the object of hazarding the passage of the Bill. He would suggest that the Report should be taken on Friday, when he doubted not that the Government would have the Bill in an improved shape.

MR. BIGGAR joined in the suggestion that the Report should be put off until Friday. If hon. Members were only allowed one day to look over the Bill, they would not have time to put on the Paper any Amendments which they might think it right to propose; and the consequence of that would be that the Committee would not have an opportunity of sufficiently examining them before they were submitted to their consideration. Again, if hon. Members, owing to the short space of time allowed to them, were unable to frame necessary Amendments, the Bill would pass the House with a number of imperfections. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer would find the Business of the House despatched by taking the Report on Friday.

MR. CALLAN thought that hon. Members would have ample time for the consideration of Amendments if the Report were taken on Thursday.

MR. RAMSAY felt it to be requisite that the Bill should be proceeded with with the least possible delay; and that, although hon. Members might have but a brief period to consider Amendments which they might wish to make, they should consider also what was due to the other House of Parliament, and assent to the Government proposal.

DR. KENEALY said, it would be more advantageous, in his opinion, to bring on Report next Friday than upon Thursday. He had the greatest hope that after the remarks which had proceeded from the front Opposition Bench the Government would no longer entertain the least doubt that public opinion was entirely in favour of the abolition of the punishment of flogging in the Army. He did not hesitate to express his belief that the proposal which had just been made was a Party move. It was a Party move, because right hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House, having seen that the whole current of public feeling in England, Ireland, and Scotland was against the punishment of flogging, had adopted this opposition for the sake of catching the wind of popularity. He believed that if another day was allowed for the purpose of bringing on this measure, the Government would find, from reports that would reach them from all quarters, that it would be most advantageous to the Service of the country to abolish flogging altogether, and that, in doing this, they had adopted a course favourable to their own interest.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN thought that the appeal made to the Government was a reasonable one, considering the large concessions made upon his side of the House. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman could say that he believed the success of the Bill would be seriously endangered by taking Report on Monday, he did not see how he could be pressed to take it on that day. He felt that Friday would not be a very convenient day, because the debate would, in all probability, be adjourned, and have to be resumed on Monday.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Supposing we had Report on Monday, and that the discussion finished at a late hour, you will have to read the Bill a third time, and to send it up to the House of Lords, when it must be printed and laid upon the Table. That cannot be done before Wednesday or Thursday; and when it is considered that in the House of Lords there sit not only the Commander-in-Chief, but Lord Cardwell, the Secretary of State for War under the late Government, Lord Cranbrook, the late Secretary of State for War, and other noble Lords interested in this matter, it would, I think, hardly seem decent to expect that they would be able to pass the Bill through, as they do many Bills, without making any observations upon it. Then it must be remembered that the Bill may come down here with Amendments, and that the Royal Assent must be obtained on Friday week. I think it will be seen from all this that the time has been run very close; and that, as the House has been in possession of the Bill since the month of February, the other House would have a right to complain if the course proposed by hon. Gentlemen were followed.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, if hon. Members abstained from further discussing the question of flogging in Committee, and in the event of the House deciding to retain that punishment, they would have an opportunity of moving their Amendments with a view to its limitation upon Report?

Dr. Kenealy

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not think the hon. Member for Meath will have much difficulty in finding a place for any observations which he may wish to make. This is a matter in which the Government has no control. The Bill will be in possession of the House, and if there are any Amendments proposed they will have to be considered and discussed, whether Government wish it or not. We shall do everything in our power to facilitate discussion of all the Amendments which may be proposed, trusting, of course, that they will be reasonable, and that there will be no attempt to introduce anything irrelevant to the subject.

MR. PARNELL asked whether, in the event of the debate upon Clause 44 continuing to a late hour on Thursday, and in the event of the House deciding to retain the punishment of flogging, the Government would give hon. Members an opportunity of introducing new clauses and moving Amendments, with a view to the limitation of the punishment, at a Morning Sitting on Friday?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY thought that on Report no Member could speak more than once.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It must be borne in mind that on Report new clauses take precedence of Amendments, and would, therefore, have to be discussed before any Amendment was proposed to Clause 44.

Clause negatived.

MR. PARNELL moved, in page 18, Clause 44, to insert the following Clause:—

“Cumulative punishments shall not be inflicted in respect of offences committed by persons subject to military law, and convicted by courts martial, in the case of penal servitude for a term exceeding seven years, and in the case of imprisonment for a term exceeding twelve months.”

The hon. Member said, that during the Sitting of the Select Committee evidence was given that soldiers were sometimes in prison for six or seven years as the effect of cumulative sentences. That had, to a great extent, been done away with in the present Bill, inasmuch as cumulative sentences could not be inflicted for more than two years. He now wished to submit that they might be fairly limited to 12 months in certain cases, because they were nearly always inflicted for small and trivial offences; and a man sentenced for getting drunk, which in itself was not of a heinous character, might, as the Bill then stood, get a very severe sentence. He asked the Secretary of State for War to further extend the principle which had been already acted upon, and to say that cumulative sentences should not be inflicted in case of imprisonment for more than 12 months, and that in case of penal servitude they should not take place for more than seven years.

New Clause (Mr. Parnell) brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

COLONEL STANLEY could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). With regard to penal servitude, he wished it to be understood that when a soldier was once condemned for crime to penal servitude he stood on the same footing as any other prisoner subject to the same punishment. As regarded accumulation of imprisonment, the hon. Member had himself drawn attention to the fact that it had been now limited to two years in all cases. That was the minimum to which, in his opinion, under all the circumstances, it was desirable to go.

MR. PARNELL pointed out that in ordinary criminal law it was not the practice to inflict cumulative sentences of imprisonment, but that it was the practice to inflict cumulative sentences of penal servitude. He asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to limit these sentences still further than was provided by the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir John Holker) said, the hon. Member was mistaken in his impression that cumulative sentences of imprisonment were not given. They were given; but it was not usual that they should amount altogether to more than two year's imprisonment.

MR. BIGGAR, referring to the description given by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) of the sufferings endured by soldiers undergoing long terms of imprisonment in hot climates, urged upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to agree to the part of the clause relating to imprisonment. It was well known that when a man was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in a hot climate it implied either death to the individual or permanent injury to his health.

Clause negatived.

MR. PARNELL moved, in page 18, after Clause 44, to insert the following clause:—"A soldier shall not be sentenced to corporal punishment more than once in twelve months." The hon. Gentleman said, that there had been several instances in which soldiers had been sentenced to corporal punishment within very short intervals. He did not say that there had been any recent instances of the practice, for, of course, the country had been at peace for a great number of years, and there had been no recent instances of the infliction of corporal punishment. In 1858 a case occurred in which a man was sentenced to receive 50 lashes thrice within six weeks. Between the second and third times of punishment his back was perfectly raw. There was nothing at present to prevent a man being flogged at intervals of three or four weeks, or even of one week. The power of flogging should not be allowed to become an abuse, but should be limited in a reasonable manner.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that if he were to accept the Amendment the result would be that if a soldier committed certain offences for which he was liable to corporal punishment, and again committed the same offence within 12 months, he would escape all punishment. As to being flogged more than once in six weeks, of course he would accept the statement of the hon. Gentleman that that had happened; but he could not conceive the circumstances under which it could have arisen, for it was the duty of the medical officer to examine and certify in writing that a man was fit to undergo any punishment. If the case had been accurately stated there must have been gross carelessness on the part of the medical officer. He was afraid, however, that although they might put in this Amendment, preventing flogging from taking place more than once in 12 months, yet no clause in an Act of Parliament would restrain soldiers from committing the crimes within that period.

MR. BIGGAR did not know whether he was correct in his opinion; but he certainly thought that if a soldier was so bad a character that he required flogging more than twice in 12 months he was better out of the Army. The argument of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to him to be very much against the principle of flogging; and he would really suggest to him whether it would not be better to agree to the Amendment, and see whether men that required flogging more than once in 12 months could not be got rid of? If they were going to keep a soldier who required flogging twice in 12 months, that man would pass a long time in hospital, and his value to the Army would be very small. If this Amendment were adopted, a man could be got rid of who was of so bad a character that he required so severe a punishment as flogging twice in so short a period as 12 months. All the arguments he had heard went to show that it was undesirable that men of vicious character should be mixed up with men of good character, who were likely to be influenced by their example. If a man were flogged twice in 12 months he would require to be put in hospital, and would only form a part of the non-effective branches of the Service; moreover, the country would be put to the expense of male or female nurses to attend him, and of a military surgeon to dress his wounds. Would it not be better, instead of incurring this expense for a vicious man of no use to the Army to turn him out of it?

MR. PARNELL asked, whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War doubted whether such a thing could happen as three floggings within six weeks after the instance he had given?

COLONEL STANLEY said, he did not doubt the accuracy of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. PARNELL would not bind himself to the accuracy of what he had stated, for he had only had the information communicated to him. He thought if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would refer to the records of the Royal Artillery of a certain place he would find that a soldier, called Davis, was flogged in the riding school three times within six weeks. On the first two occasions he took it very well, but the third time his back was covered with ulcers; but, nevertheless, the medical man allowed the punishment to be inflicted. There was a great noise about the matter at the time, and he might mention that the name of the officer who inflicted it was Cartwright.

MR. SULLIVAN knew of an instance which occurred in 1867, when a man was flogged twice in something less than a week. The man was tried for a specific offence, and sentenced to 50 lashes and two years' imprisonment. On hearing his sentence he threw up his cap, and called out for three cheers for the General presiding at the Court. He was called back, and sentenced to receive 50 more lashes and two years' more imprisonment. He got 50 lashes the next week, and within the same week received the second 50; he also served his four years' imprisonment. That incident occurred in Dublin, in 1867.

MR. OTWAY said, that the observations of hon. Members were thrown away. It had been urged upon the Government that a man who deserved flogging more than once in 12 months was better out of the Army. To that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman replied by reiterating the weak, foolish argument which they had heard hundreds of times when this question was discussed years ago, that they must not allow a soldier to see that he could be got rid of. Why, that was the very thing they ought to do—they wanted to get rid of the bad character. They had heard a good deal about the military authorities with regard to this question. He thought that the civilians in that House were much more competent to discuss this question, and advise upon it, than the military authorities, when they put forward the argument that it was better to flog a man twice in 12 months than get rid of him altogether.

Question put.

MR. PARNELL moved, in page 18, after Clause 44, to insert the following clause:—

(Instrument to be used.)

“The instrument to be used in the infliction of corporal punishment shall be a cat-o'-nine tails according to the scaled pattern approved by the First Lord of the Admiralty, and the seventh day of December, One thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, from the Royal Marine Office, and endorsed W. J. Rodney, D. A. G., but without knots."

The hon. Gentleman said, that it would be in the recollection of the Committee that, during the discussion upon the instrument to be used for the infliction of this punishment, some remarkable statements were made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty. In reply to some observations made, he denied that there was any Marine cat, and he also denied that there was any cat used on board the training ship at Portsmouth. After some considerable contention, the cats were brought down to the House, and exhibited in one of the rooms, in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. There was also exhibited the cat belonging to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in use in prisons. They then found that one of the cats from the Admiralty came from the Duke of Wellington, at Portsmouth. Another cat, which was called the Marine cat, was produced, and also a smaller cat, the one referred to in his Amendment, and which was said by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to be used in the Army. The result of the discussion that took place showed a very remarkable ignorance on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Home Secretary, and the Secretary of State for War, as to the instruments which they used in inflicting this punishment. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty admitted, at that time, that he had not seen the instruments; neither, he (Mr. Parnell) supposed, had the Secretary of State for War; and everything which happened then and since had shown the necessity that an instrument not of exceptional severity should be used in the infliction of this punishment. They had no information as to the nature of the cats used on board ship for flogging soldiers and sailors, or as to the nature of the cats used in the operations in South Africa. They had recently heard, upon the authority of the Government, that 200 soldiers had been flogged in South Africa—that was one out of every 75 of the Force there. He should be very glad to know what pattern of cat had been used; whether it was according to the pattern of the Home Secretary—a cat of the most villainous description—or whether the cat was according to the pattern of that used on board the Duke of Wellington training ship, or whether it was according to the two other patterns found at the Admiralty? He was at a loss to understand that there was any pattern. It seemed to be left to the captain of a ship to choose his own cat, and to please himself as to the number of knots, and the weight of handle, and the length of tails. He thought it desirable that if they had an instrument of that kind it should not be one which would inflict an excessive punishment. He had chosen that pattern of cat which seemed to him to be the best. It was true the pattern he had chosen, now in the charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, had a number of knots; but he thought the cat to be used should be without knots. If that punishment were to be inflicted, they desired to lessen the torture as much as possible; and since the House had decided to inflict the cat-o'-nine-tails they asked that there should be some uniformity in the instruments used, and that an excessive cat should not be employed.

Mr. MACDONALD agreed with the proposition of the hon. Member for Meath. He might be misinformed; but he had strong reason to believe that the cat which had been exhibited, and which was said to be the Naval cat, was not the cat in use at the present moment in several stations where Her Majesty's Squadrons were. Three years ago he was in California, and it was there said to him—rightly or wrongly he did not know, for he did not see the hands turned out for punishment, and did not witness the flogging—but he was then informed that though an order had then gone forth, from the First Lord of the Admiralty, that a sealed cat should be used, that that was not the cat then in operation, but the same cat which was in existence 25 or 30 years before, and was in use in the Pacific Squadron. If that were the case then, and if that were the case now, unless it was specifically declared in the Bill that the cat to be used should be a cat without knots, what guarantee had they that the same thing should not occur again? He saw there an hon. and gallant Gentleman who had had some experience in Her Majesty's Navy, and, perhaps, he would be able to inform the Committee if there were not a cat used with more than nine knots? That being the case, he could, at least, speak from certain knowledge that such a cat did exist 30 years ago. He hoped that the hon. Member for Meath would go to a Division upon his Amendment.

MR. CALLAN trusted that the hon. Member for Meath would not be put to the trouble of going to a Division upon his Amendment, for he conceived that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was bound in honour personally to the House to accede to the Amendment. But, before he proceeded with that matter, he must be allowed to remark upon the departure from the House of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty. It was not only not respectful to the House, but it was not respectful to the hon. Member for Meath. No sooner had allusion been made to the Navy cat than the right hon. Gentleman sneaked out of the House.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member must not use the words "sneaked out of the House," as the expression was not Parliamentary.

MR. CALLAN said, that he withdrew the word "sneaked," and would only say that the right hon. Gentleman had covertly left the House. He had gradually moved along the Treasury Bench, until he imagined he could leave the House without being observed. He had left the House, evidently and purposely, to avoid exciting attention.

COLONEL STANLEY did not think that the hon. Member would wish to misrepresent his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. He might explain that his right hon. Friend had merely gone to what the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) once happily described as "Committee of Supply."

MR. CALLAN said, that he would reserve his remarks with reference to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty. In the original debate upon the clause as it was first placed before the House, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War stated, in reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), that the Army cat had no knots, and was exactly similar to the sealed pattern cat at the Admiralty. It was said in the House, in his presence, that the Army cat was precisely similar to the sealed pattern Army cat in the Navy; but it had been seen that the Marine cat was the only sealed pattern cat at the Admiralty. It was also said by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, that the Marine cat was without knots; the Marine cat had now been exhibited in that House, and had nine knots. Those assertions could not be contradicted, and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, by his own admissions, was honourably bound to accede to the clause proposed by the hon. Member for Meath.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that there seemed to be some misapprehension, which he would endeavour to remove. Speaking from recollection, he believed that the first question he was asked was with regard to the pattern of the cat, and whether it was the same as the Navy and Home Office pattern? To that he replied that, not being acquainted with either, he could not answer the question. He was then asked whether the cat had knots? He had never seen a cat for 20 years, and he could not exactly remember the pattern of it. With regard to the actual cat, he was asked to seal a pattern. Whether there was a sealed cat or not already he did not know, as the thing had not been in use for many years. He replied that he would seal the pattern, and that he would take the cat in use in the Army, whether better or worse than any other. There were obvious reasons for not departing from that pattern. He had also been asked whether that cat was similar to the Marine cat? He believed that it was; but as the instrument had not been in use in this country for 10 or 12 years it was difficult to speak with regard to it.

MR. CALLAN said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was under a misapprehension. In the course of the debate it had been stated that the cat in the Army was the same as that used in the Navy; it was also stated that the sealed pattern cat at the Admiralty had no knots. The instrument deposited in that House, in the charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, consisted of nine tails of strong whipcord, with nine knots at the end of each tail, which would inflict, in the hands of a skilful administrator, such punishment as would remove 81 pieces of flesh. [Colonel STANLEY dissented.] The right hon. and gallant Gentleman shook his head; but he (Mr. Callan) had not the slightest doubt that that would be the result of the experiment, if they could find a subject to make it upon. He would suggest that the cat-o'-nine-tails at the Admiralty, and the Marine cat, at present the only sealed cat—the cat with nine tails and nine knots—should be made the universal pattern. They should eliminate the nine knots from the nine tails of that cat, and they would diminish the question by eight-ninths. He did not know whether he should be right in referring to the Naval cat in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty; he only wished, however, to make a comparison. The Marine cat was not the Navy cat; but he saw at the Admiralty the Navy cat. When he saw it it was endorsed, "Specimen approved of, lodged in store many years ago." But when that cat was deposited in the care of the Sergeant-at-Arms that endorsement was removed, and the following endorsement was substituted:—"Specimen cat, approved of for use on board Her Majesty's ships for seamen and Marines." He had been contradicted with reference to his statement that there was a Navy cat and a Marine cat. The hon. Member for Meath put a question to him with reference to the matter, and he stated, in reply, that the endorsement had been changed. That was the first opportunity he had had of saying that that endorsement had been changed, and the person who informed the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty that the former endorsement had been removed, because it was no longer required, was unworthy of holding office in the Admiralty. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman had not made the statement of his own knowledge; it was a deliberate falsification by some subordinate officials in the Admiralty. Acting upon the information given him, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had come down to the House and stated that the endorsement had been removed because it was no longer required. But if no longer required, why not send the cat to the Museum? The whole matter, in connection with these cats, had been conducted by the right hon. Gentlemen the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretary of State for War, not from their own knowledge, but from the misleading statements of subordinates. It was due to themselves, as Members of that House, to ascertain and investigate who were the persons really responsible for these falsifications. He did not suppose that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had ever seen a cat in his life. He could not see what objection he could have to remove the nine knots from each of the nine tails. The vote which they were about to take was upon the question that the Secretary of State for War insisted upon having nine knots at the end of each of the nine tails, in order to scarify a poor soldier's back by taking off 81 pieces of flesh. That was the vote which they would have to give next Thursday—namely, whether the cat was to have nine tails, and nine knots to each tail? If the nine knots were removed from the end of the tails, he would not go to much inconvenience in coming to the Division on Thursday; but unless the right hon. and gallant Gentleman removed those knots he could not lay much claim to the merciful consideration hitherto shown him at the hands of hon. Members.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. BIGGAR said, that so far as he knew, the Secretary of State for War had not given them any information as to what the nature of the cats to be used was to be. He should be glad to know to what extent the cat he recommended resembled the sealed cat in the possession of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he had an appeal to make to the hon. Member for Meath, and he wished to point out what he thought was rather delaying the further progress of the Bill. His hon. Friend was very anxious, if the House should hereafter affirm the continued propriety of corporal punishment, that he should have an opportunity of moving the various limiting clauses; and he understood from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that those clauses would have to come first on Report. It would be extremely inconvenient to take up the time on Thursday in discussing those limiting clauses, when the House really wanted to come to a Division on the main question. What was really desired was that Thursday should be occupied, so far as it was necessary to be occupied at all, by a discussion on the main question. A Division would probably be taken late at night as to whether there was to be any flogging at all. That question having been decided, his hon. Friend wished to have an opportunity of moving his limiting clauses, which opportunity he would obtain if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would undertake that the debate on the Report should then be adjourned to a Morning Sitting on Friday. If that could be arranged, he would advise his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendments now and reserve himself for Friday.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was most anxious to make any arrangements which would facilitate the discussion of that question; but, of course, the Government had not the power to override the Rules of the House, and one of those Rules was that when a Bill was discussed upon Report new clauses must be disposed of before they came to the Amendments. If, therefore, they had any new clauses to propose, unless one of them should raise the whole question of the principle of flogging, to which he had nothing to say, they must discuss those clauses before they came to the amendment of the Bill in detail. He should, of course, be most anxious that the discussion should be continued, if necessary; and if the Bill were not finished on Thursday he should propose a Morning Sitting on Friday, and, if necessary, a Sitting on Saturday as well, though he did not like to propose Saturday Sittings.

MR. HOPWOOD asked, whether it would not be possible for his hon. Friend to move some general affirmation on proceeding to the consideration of the Report?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes.

MR. DILLWYN said, that there was another plan. The whole question might be raised upon another clause, which could be taken before all other clauses. Perhaps that would be a more convenient course.

Mr. Chamberlain

COLONEL STANLEY said, that, personally, he was inclined to agree with the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn); but the matter did not rest in their hands. It was competent to any hon. Member to move a new clause; but, of course, the precedence of these clauses inter se must be decided by hon. Members themselves; and, in that case, if the clause were taken it would probably be advisable to take it early.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be willing to give up Friday to the Amendments?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should be very glad if the discussion on corporal punishment could be taken the first thing on Thursday, and if any arrangement could be made by which the question could be so raised. It would then run on; and, of course, the Government would be quite willing to make any arrangements by which the other discussion might be concluded. He would not anticipate the discussion on corporal punishment, which might last the whole night. If it did not finish on that night, they would, of course, be prepared to continue it on Friday morning.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked whether the discussion would go on late on Thursday night?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought it was rather inconvenient to put all these hypothetical questions, because it was impossible to say what might happen. The Committee, however, were perfectly aware of what the general feeling of the Government was. They did not wish to keep the Committee sitting at unreasonable hours, nor, on the other hand, did they wish to shorten or stifle discussion; but, at the same time, they wished to get through the Bill, so as to let it go out of that House in the course of the current week.

MR. PARNELL said, that all he wanted to secure was this—after the field day on Thursday, and in the event of the House deciding on corporal punishment, he wanted to have on Friday an opportunity of asking the House to limit the matter in certain ways. There were, for instance, the Amendments on the Schedule, which, otherwise, it would be necessary to move that night. He thought, however, it would be great waste of time to go on moving Amendments with regard to flogging that night pending the decision of the House, which was to be taken on the Report; and if there was any way in which their right would be recognized to move those Amendments subsequently to the debate on the principle of flogging on Thursday he should be perfectly satisfied, and would not detain the Committee by pressing those points at that moment. He thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer meant to deal fairly by them, and that they need not further press their Amendments that night.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, before the Motion was withdrawn, wished to say that this was exactly one of those cases where the proverb, "Where there's a will there's a way," applied. If they agreed that there should be, first of all, on Thursday a discussion upon the main principle of flogging, they would leave it entirely to hon. Gentlemen to consider how they would like to raise their Amendments. They could ascertain what the Rules of the House were upon that point. The Government, on their part, were perfectly ready to offer facilities on Friday for the discussion of any limitation hon. Members might wish to propose, provided they would take care that they were proposed in such a way as not to raise unnecessary side issues, but would let the House go, without waste of time unnecessarily, to the discussion of those limitations. Possibly, the House might then be ready, having put the Bill into shape, to read it a third time at once.

MR. CALLAN wished to correct a misapprehension that had arisen, to the effect that the Navy cat had knots upon its tails. That was not so, it being a peculiarity reserved for the Army cat.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL moved to insert, after Clause 53, the following clause:—

(Prisoner may be represented by legal adviser.)

"A prisoner tried by court martial shall be entitled to be represented by a legal adviser, who shall conduct the defence of such prisoner in like manner as in a trial before a court of civil judicature, subject to such rules of procedure as may be from time to time adopted in accordance with the provisions of this Act for the conduct of courts martial."

The hon. Gentleman said, that the subject with which the Amendment dealt was a very important one. At present, a prisoner tried by court martial was not entitled to have his defence conducted by a counsel or a solicitor. Prisoners were allowed to be represented by a friend, which friend was usually a legal gentleman. They had not the advantage of having before them the rules of procedure that were being adopted by the Government with regard to the proceedings of courts martial. One of the clauses of the Bill gave to the Secretary of State for War power to frame rules and proceedings for courts martial; but they did not know what those rules were at present, though he assumed that the old practice would be continued, and that there would be no material alteration made, so far as that part of the procedure went. But, at the same time, he thought it would be of the greatest possible importance that it should be a settled and understood thing that a prisoner tried by court martial should be entitled to have his defence conducted by a professional adviser, otherwise they might have a court martial refusing to allow a prisoner to be represented. The Select Committee which inquired into that Bill last Session made a very strong representation, to the effect that in every case a prisoner should be permitted to have the assistance of a legal adviser, though they did not recommend that such a provision should be embodied in the Bill, or made part of an Act of Parliament. There was rather a difficulty as to the way in which to arrange it, because the Committee did not consider that question until very late in the Session, when they had very little time before them, and, consequently, could not have the advantage of witnesses who were capable of speaking with authority on the question. But he would submit that now that they were passing a permanent Act they should not let the opportunity go by without securing for the soldier or the officer who was to be tried the privilege of having legal advice, if he so desired. In fact, he thought that in a case where a soldier was unable to pay for that advice a counsel ought to be assigned to him, just as a counsel was assigned to an undefended prisoner in an ordinary civil case. The Act was a very complex one. It created a variety of new crimes and new offences, the punishment for which was very severe. It was, therefore, of the greatest importance that the soldier should be represented, at all events, on a court martial, when he was being tried for any serious offence, by a competent adviser, who was capable of understanding military law.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that the subject was one which had been under the consideration both of the House and of other Bodies, to whom the Civil and Military Law of the country had been referred. The hon. Member for Meath seemed to be hardly aware that the present practice was not a practice under a recognized Statute, and the employment of counsel as a friend was merely the result of a provision in the Queen's Regulations. He had not the Queen's Regulations in his hand; but they provided for all proceedings by court martial, and, amongst other things, it was provided and established that a prisoner should be represented by counsel—that was, by a friend acting as counsel, though that friend was not allowed to address the court, nor to cross-examine witnesses. It would, however, be quite open to the Secretary of State for War, if he thought proper, to alter his Regulations, and to declare that a prisoner might be represented in a court martial exactly as in a civil court. It was, however, the opinion of all the authorities, and of those who had given evidence upon the subject, that it was not in any way desirable to change the present practice. Amongst others who had given valuable evidence was that of an hon. and gallant Member who he regretted not to see in his place. That hon. and gallant Gentleman, having been examined as a witness, and having great experience on the subject of courts martial, gave very strong evidence in favour of the present practice, and that opinion he repeated in his place in equally strong terms. The objection to any alteration he would state shortly as follows:—First of all, it started with the proposal that if a prisoner was too poor to employ a counsel the Government should assign a counsel to him. That would entail enormous expense; but passing by that, the great objection to the proposal was that it would place the court, which was essentially a military court, under a disadvantage if cases were always to be argued upon one side and the other by skilled lawyers. According to the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), he had not wished to see barristers on one side or the other. If it were allowed, then the legal staff, the staff of advocates, would be superior to the court itself, and, in all probability, justice would not be done. But if they allowed prisoners always to be represented by professional advocates, it would be necessary for the Government also to have a large legal staff always at their disposal, not only upon general courts martial, but also upon district and regimental courts martial. There would always be a crowd of men willing to serve and pick up cases; it would be necessary for the Secretary of State always to be ready with advocates on the other side, and endless expense would thus be incurred. Now, let them see whether there was any injustice to the prisoners in the present system. He had seen a good number of those cases since he had held the Office he was in; and he certainly sided with the military authorities in considering that no alteration was necessary; although, if he thought for one moment that if any injustice to a prisoner was done, he should be the first to recommend an alteration. At present, the prisoner had a friend who was a professional friend. He prepared all the questions; he wrote the defence; in fact, he did everything for the prisoner, except addressing the court. Under the present regulations, all that took place at courts martial were taken down in writing by some person who was employed for that purpose, or else by a shorthand writer. That being so, he did not think, himself, that the prisoner would be so very much benefited by having questions, in the nature of cross-examination, put suddenly to witnesses. Every question that a witness desired to put to witnesses, either in the examination-in-chief or cross-examination, could be put, and he did not see under what disadvantage the prisoner lay. He might also mention that all findings and sentences of courts martial were submitted to the Judge Advocate General. The Deputy Judge Advocate also attended every general court martial as a matter of course, and he attended district or regimental courts martial when his services were required. When he was present it was his duty to watch the proceedings, and to see that no prisoner was put to any disadvantage, and he acted, to a certain extent, as the prisoner's friend. Then, after all that, the proceedings, which were in writing, had to go to the Judge Advocate General's Office, where they were perused with the greatest care, and where it was absolutely certain that if there was any point whatever which tended to the disadvantage of the prisoner it was rigidly examined, and, if possible, turned to the prisoner's advantage. He might say that since he had held the Office of Judge Advocate General he had never heard of a complaint, on the part of a prisoner, that he suffered from the action of the present system; and, under those circumstances, seeing that the practice had been established for a long time without detriment to the Public Service or to the prisoners who were tried; seeing also that the practice had the approbation not only of the military authorities themselves, but of those skilled persons who had been examined by Commission or upon Committees, he could not see any reason for any alteration in the present practice, an opinion in which he believed he should be confirmed by his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War. He, for one, would venture to submit to the Committee that this was not the proper way to make the change, even if the change itself was not objected to. The proposal of the hon. Member for Meath was one which he thought the Committee could not accept. The procedure which he recommended might, or might not, be advisable; but to put it into the Statute was a proceeding to which he should very strongly object. He was sure that the proposition would meet with the objection of the Government, and, indeed, of any Government who had the conduct of legislation. To change the procedure was one thing; but to put it into the Statute was quite different.

MR. SULLIVAN thought there had been a good deal more of the General than of the Judge in the speech which they had just heard. The right hon. and learned Judge Advocate General had told them that a prisoner at present had legal assistance only; that the assistant was to be called a friend; and that, as a matter of fact, at many courts martial a barrister or solicitor was that friend. What was now proposed was that the cumbrous machinery and grievous waste of time involved in writing down and handing in the questions to the President of the court might be abolished, and in place of that the right of questioning should be put into the hands of the prisoner's counsel. He never heard anything more lame or illogical than the statement put forward from the Treasury Bench. It was said they had already legal assistance, and therefore they could not allow a prisoner to have any further legal assistance, in the same manner as a man on trial for his life in a civil court had a right to legal assistance. It was said that it was not for the convenience of the military tribunal that any further legal assistance should be permitted. If the forms of the law for the due and essential protection of life and liberty in civil courts were not a myth, then they should be adopted, so far as possible, in military tribunals. If the forms of defence allowed a man upon trial for his in ordinary civil courts were useful for bringing out the facts and for the protection of innocence, surely the man on trial for his life before a court martial ought to be allowed the protection of those forms of procedure. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had assumed that the accused already received substantial justice, and that they were allowed counsel; and he further said that if the counsel were to be allowed to put questions to the witnesses he did not see what the Crown could do. As if the Crown could not find counsel to represent it! He had not the slightest doubt that the Committee would agree that if these things were necessary for the protection of innocence or the conviction of crime, they must in that case import something more than judicial proceedings into a court martial. The proceedings of a court martial would be held under this Statute; and, therefore, upon the provisions of the Statute they were then passing would depend the efficient defence of many military prisoners. He would put to the Judge Advocate General to judge this matter as a Judge, and not as an advocate or a General, and consider whether it was not time, when they were passing such a measure as the present, that they should allow a prisoner on his trial before a military tribunal that defence and protection which the law cast around the same man if on his trial before an ordinary civil court.

COLONEL STANLEY agreed with his right hon. and learned Friend the Judge Advocate General that very much was to be said as to the disadvantage of inserting a provision of the nature proposed in an Act of Parliament. He fully agreed that it would be much better to make this a matter of regulation. He might point out that if it were put into the Act that a prisoner tried by a court martial should be entitled to be represented by a legal adviser, and that the court had power to have a legal adviser for the defence of the prisoner, they would be doing a great deal of harm, for there were many petty cases of courts martial—such as absence without leave—where the evidence was perfectly clear, and the prisoner had even admitted his guilt, in which there was not the least necessity for counsel to be employed for the prisoner. Moreover, considerable delay in the trial might be caused by such a provision. He had no hesitation in saying that he had always been in favour of adopting, so far as he could, such improvements in the procedure of courts martial as might be consistent with the efficiency of the Service. But, under the varying circumstances, it was impossible to lay down a hard-and-fast line in matters of procedure; and he did not think it likely that wherever a prisoner applied to be defended, either by an officer or by a legal adviser, his request would be refused. Such a request was never refused when there was reasonable ground for granting it. But he thought to put into an Act of Parliament a hard-and-fast line allowing prisoners to retain counsel might lead to a miscarriage of justice, and, in the result, might tend rather to the disadvantage of the prisoner than otherwise.

SIR HENRY JAMES did not think that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had quite apprehended the effect of the proposed new clause. In his opinion, the clause was a very reasonable one, and he would support it to the best of his ability. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to think that if a hard-and-fast line were drawn, giving a prisoner a right to a legal adviser, delay would be caused in the administration of justice. That was not the object of the Motion. In cases, however small, before a magistrate in a civil court, the person accused of a minor offence could obtain legal assistance if he pleased. To say that the accused person had a right to legal assistance was not the same thing as to say that he had it. He had it if he could obtain it. This was really a somewhat serious matter, and he must take exception to the manner in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General had dealt with the matter. One of the arguments he used against the suggestion was, he admitted, an argument which had very great weight with him. The Judge Advocate General said that one objection to the Amendment was that the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) did not approve of it. Naturally, he (Sir Henry James) attached great weight to the opinion of his hon. and learned Friend; but he thought that the Government should be as mindful of his opinions on other occasions as on the present. He would suggest to the Government that the next time that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford expressed an opinion they should at once give way to him, before they asked other hon. Members to do so on the present occasion.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that the hon. and learned Member for Oxford had given evidence before the Royal Commission upon courts martial, when this subject was very much considered.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that unless the Judge Advocate General agreed with what his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford said the next time he heard him he could not be bound by his argument. Another suggestion put forward by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General was that prisoners now had legal assistance, and that they did not want more. He said, also, what legal assistance could the Crown have if the prisoner were represented? The best way to meet that difficulty was to let the Judge Advocate General appear in person. Let him conduct the case on the part of the Crown, and what chance would the prisoner have against him, in weight of eloquence, knowledge, and skill, in cross-examination? But even under such disadvantages, he saw no reason why justice should not be done; and he thought they should consider the subject very seriously. The reason for the opposition to the proposal was, as the Judge Advocate General had said, that the military authorities were against it. There was no doubt they would be against it; but he would ask the Committee seriously to consider the arguments in favour of the clause. The Committee must recollect that, for the first time, the Legislature was placing civilians under military law. At the wish of the Government they had accepted the 167th clause, which placed camp followers under military law. Everyone accompanying a camp—were he newspaper correspondent, civilian, or the humblest sutler—was brought under military law. Was it not right, therefore, to ask that the civil rights belonging to every civilian should be accorded to him? And it was especially necessary that his case should be stated from a civilian point of view. The course now taken was to allow an adviser who, it was said, might be either a legal adviser or a military adviser. But the prisoner's adviser was not allowed to ask a witness a single question. It was said that the questions must be written down and filtered through the court. What chance, therefore, was there of detecting a dishonest witness who always prevaricated? If the Judge Advocate General were examining a witness, he would not give him time to reflect what answer to give, for reflection only produced dishonest answers. What was the result of the present system? One result was to cause a great and unnecessary waste of public time. Another result was injustice to everyone, for by those means they could never obtain from a witness the quick answer—the answer of truth. Those were his objections to the present system; but what the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General said was that he did not say whether the practice was right, or whether it was wrong; but he did say that the change ought not to be made by Statute. Now that they had made civilians subject to military law, they should take care to see that injustice was not done. Every argument used by the right hon. and learned Gentleman could be used against the prisoner. All that the Judge Advocate General did was to ask them to trust to the Government, and allow them to regulate the procedure. But they had just now heard the Government state that they did not think that this right should be conceded. The Judge Advocate General would say, when consulted about the matter—"The hon. and learned Member for Oxford objects to it; you will see that you cannot get counsel for the Crown; it is a thing that had better not be done." The matter should not be left to chance; but it should be stated in the Bill that, in some form or other, prisoners should be entitled to be represented by counsel at courts martial. It must be a matter of general regulation, and not of particular regulation; and, therefore, the Committee must decide the question once for all. The Government had told them that they would not make it a subject of general regulation, and they could not make it a subject of particular regulation. He had not, hitherto, placed himself in opposition to the Bill; but that was a matter to which he had always been anxious to draw the attention of the House, and he should, therefore, support the hon. Member for Meath, and he trusted that he would go to a Division upon the question.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) thought that these matters had become somewhat confused. In the first place arose the question, whether an accused person should have a right to counsel? With that proposal he was disposed to agree in principle. He thought that, in some form or other, the prisoner ought to have counsel; but there was another totally different question involved, which should be treated in a different way. They were not then dealing with the procedure of ordinary Courts of Justice, but that of a military tribunal. He did not wish to detain the Committee by detailing the proceedings of ordinary Courts of Justice, and he would only say that they arrived at their conclusions by an entirely different method from that which was adopted by military tribunals. In a civil court they had a Judge, whose duty it was to examine what evidence should be submitted to the jury, and to direct them upon it. In a court martial, on the other hand, each member of the court was both a judge and juryman; and the difference between the mode of examining and cross-examining in those courts, and that pursued in the ordinary civil courts, resulted from the difference in the constitution of the two sets of tribunals. He believed that the practice of putting questions in writing had not been found inconvenient, and had not, he believed, produced any injustice. But the Amendment, besides giving the accused the assistance of counsel, went on to say that his counsel—

“Shall conduct the defence of such prisoner in like manner as in a trial before a court of civil judicature.”

Did that mean that the procedure was to be the same? If it did mean that the procedure was to be the same as that adopted in a civil court, instead of the questions being reduced to writing, the prisoner's counsel would be at once entitled to cross-examine. That might be either right or wrong; but if it were intended, what was the meaning of saying that these courts were to be subject to such rules of procedure as might be, from time to time, adopted in accordance with the provisions of the Act for the conduct of courts martial? The rules of procedure would, probably, provide for the military forms of proceedings to be adopted, and there would at once be a conflict. Before the Committee could be asked to decide upon this question, they ought to know what was intended. Was it intended to force upon the military tribunal the form of procedure used in the Law Courts? If so, let it be plainly expressed, and then it would be found that military men would point out reasons why those forms of procedure, very useful in themselves and indispensable in civil courts, were totally inapplicable to military tribunals, which were generally composed of laymen, and had only to determine simple questions of fact. In its present form, it seemed to him that the Amendment was inadmissible, for it did not state what form of procedure was intended to be enforced by the Statute; and if it were intended to enforce the procedure of the ordinary Courts of Law upon courts martial, then he said that that object was undesirable.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would be very cautious before he gave any promise to adopt this Amendment in any shape or form. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had answered the Judge Advocate General by telling him to conduct the prosecution himself. How could the right hon. and learned Gentleman do that, when courts martial were held in all parts of the world, and in places where no lawyers could be obtained. He did not think that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had placed the question in a proper form before the Committee. He spoke of the prisoners not being allowed the advice of legal friends; but the fact was that they could advise with as many legal friends as they pleased. The only condition was that the prisoner's friend was not to address the court by word of mouth. That was the only condition, and when it was considered that officers were not lawyers it seemed to him to be a just and proper provision. He would mention that the Lord Chief Justice of England had stated that, in his opinion, courts martial were the most fair tribunal known to the law, and that they were always in favour of the prisoner. Then the Court Martial Commission of 1869 had expressed a similar opinion. Sir Colman O'Loughlen had also given an official opinion that the proceedings of courts martial were highly fair and equitable. He did not think that there was any necessity to permit counsel to address the court in defence of the prisoner. He trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not accede to the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath.

MAJOR NOLAN did not think that the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire was quite right in stating that soldiers were not lawyers. There were many instances to the contrary. He believed that several American Generals were lawyers before the war began. He would very strongly support the view of the hon. Member for Meath—a view which had been so strongly advocated by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James). He was not quite certain whether some limitation should not be introduced into the Amendment. He would recommend that the power to employ counsel should be limited to general or district courts martial, and that at smaller cases coming before a regimental court martial counsel should not be allowed. He must say that the arguments of the hon. and learned Solicitor General were not convincing to him. The argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman was, that because the questions were put into writing there was no necessity why counsel should be employed in cross-examination. What he would suggest was, that in making rules for the procedure of courts martial it should not be necessary to put down all questions in writing; but that a precis of the proceedings should be made, and so the cumbrous nature of the proceedings, as at present conducted, would be avoided. He also thought that some discretion should be left to the Presidents of the courts, in order to the saving of time, and the simplifying of the proceedings; and he could not accept the proposition that the presence of counsel in courts martial would have the effect which he desiderated. As far as courts martial were concerned—and he spoke from personal knowledge of them—the questions to be decided were, in 19 cases out of 20, of the most simple character; and the plan which it was now proposed to make general would only apply to the twentieth case. He had, on many occasions, noticed the disadvantage at which a prisoner was placed by the present cumbrous system under which the President of a court martial declined to put down in writing a question which a prisoner wished to put who was, so to speak, working round to the basis of his defence. The labour of writing down the questions very often caused the Presidents of courts martial to decline to allow them to be put. In France, at the present moment, there was no objection to courts martial being addressed by legal gentlemen; and he certainly failed to see the validity of the objections which had been raised to the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath on the present occasion.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA thought that if there was any real force in the objections which had been raised by the hon. and learned Solicitor General, they would equally apply to the employment of counsel on examinations of accused persons before magistrates who, in many cases, were not lawyers. Such a practice as had been adopted in courts martial would certainly not be now followed in the ordinary criminal courts of the country; and he saw no reason why it should be continued in courts martial. He could see no reason, moreover, why civilians, who were, for the first time, brought under the operation of military law, should be at once deprived of the rights which they would have enjoyed if they had remained civilians, and declined to serve their country as volunteers.

MR. HOPWOOD was unable to see that there could be greater inconvenience in having legal gentlemen—whether attorneys, or solicitors, or barristers—present at courts martial, than there would be in allowing their presence at any other Courts of First Instance in criminal, or quasi-criminal, cases. It had been said that the only way out of the difficulty was to employ professional shorthand writers; but he was unable to see the necessity of taking any such step, because there must surely be in every regiment several men with sufficient clerical ability and general intelligence to take down a precis of the evidence given at any court martial that might be held.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE, while supporting the proposal which had been made, would limit its operation to general courts martial. If it was extended to regimental and other courts martial, the men would form clubs for the employment of legal assistance, and the result would be an enormous loss of time, without any corresponding gain, as far as the discipline of the Army was concerned.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL opposed the proposal to allow counsel to appear in military, as in civil cases, on the ground, mainly, that, in the majority of cases, it would not be possible to retain efficient counsel to appear; but, on the contrary, counsel might appear who would not assist the court.

MR. HERMON pointed out that the Bill, if passed, would put many thousands of civilians under military law who were not under that law at present; and, therefore, he saw no reason why those persons should not be put on an equal footing with the civilians, whose ranks they left in order to join the Army.

MR. E. JENKINS thought it would be well, even if prisoners were not allowed legal assistance, that they should have the sort of assistance which would be afforded by appointing legal assessors to assist at courts martial, so that such courts should be conducted according to the rules of evidence. He wished to point out to the Secretary of State for War that, whatever might be said by military Members of the House with regard to the constitution and procedure of courts martial, grave dissatisfaction existed in the Army with respect to the procedure, and it was necessary that steps should be taken to place that procedure on a better footing. Of course, in small courts martial it might be inconvenient to have counsel present; but it was not impossible to give a prisoner the option of employing counsel. In 99 cases out of 100 that option would not be taken advantage of; but there could be no practical harm in giving a soldier an opportunity of exercising it. If permission were granted in higher cases, surely the same privilege ought to be extended to soldiers. He would like to hear from the Secretary of State for War that some effort would be made to alter the existing state of things. He did not say whether the alteration should be expressed in the clauses of the Bill, or whether it should be established by Queen's Regulation; but the right hon. and gallant Gentleman ought to give the Committee some pledge that an effort would be made to improve the administration of justice at courts martial, and to insure their being always well advised by legal authority. It was time that the Office of Judge Advocate General should be made one of authority; that the Judge Advocate General should be a person in whom the whole Army might confide, and on whose opinion not only officers, but soldiers, might rely. He was making no invidious suggestion in pointing out what, in his opinion, a Judge Advocate General should be. It was not necessary to regard this as a personal matter; he was considering it in the abstract. He wanted to know whether the Secretary of State for War was prepared to entertain any of the proposals which were on the Paper for the purpose of improving the constitution and procedure of courts martial? Because he should certainly support the hon. Member for Meath if he went to a Division, unless the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was able to show that the establishment was being considered of some mode of procedure which would secure at every court martial the presence of some person who had studied military law, and was competent to give an opinion upon it. That was not unreasonable. Every soldier ought to feel that the proceedings would be so conducted that when the Judge Advocate General became possessed of them he would see, if he happened to be a lawyer, that no irregularity had been committed. He called upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to make some statement with reference to the matter; and, in the meantime, he could only say he considered that the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath was one which ought to be supported by the Committee.

COLONEL ALEXANDER wished to point out to the hon. Members for Preston (Mr. Hermon) and Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), and the Committee generally, that under the Queen's Regulations a soldier could already have a professional adviser, although the adviser could not address the court. That was exactly what the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had stated. He quite agreed that it was only at general courts martial a professional adviser could possibly be required, as at a regimental court the evidence was, as a rule, purely formal, and having a professional adviser in such a trumpery matter as that would be a waste of both time and money.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE did not know whether the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken was in the House when the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) addressed the Committee, as the hon. and learned Gentleman, in a powerful speech in favour of the new clause, showed how utterly incompetent courts martial, as at present constituted, were to elicit facts in a satisfactory manner. It was quite clear, now that civilians were, under certain circumstances, liable to be tried by court martial, that a proposal of this kind ought to be adopted. During the discussion strong objections had been urged against the employment of counsel in regimental courts martial, and it was possible that the hon. Member for Meath would be willing to omit those courts from his clause. He would, therefore, suggest whether the Government might not be able to settle the question on that basis.

MR. COLE said, it struck him that the most important part of the new clause was that relating to the mode in which a counsel or solicitor should conduct the defence of a prisoner under trial by court martial. It was admitted that by the Queen's Regulations counsel were entitled to appear; but, at present, where they did appear they were perfectly useless, as all they could do was to write questions on paper and pass them to the court. One of the principal uses of a counsel was the exercise of his power of cross-examination; but that power was now entirely destroyed by the manner in which counsel were muzzled. They were unable to address the court; but he submitted that they ought to be able to act as if they were appearing before an ordinary civil tribunal. Certainly, in important cases, prisoners ought to be entitled to the assistance of counsel, though it was not necessary that the same rule should apply to small regimental courts. He strongly advised the Committee to adopt the clause—at all events, so much of it as would enable a counsel to conduct a case at a court martial in the ordinary way.

MR. OTWAY thought it desirable that perfect equality should be established in the trial of officers and soldiers. He agreed with what had been stated with reference to regimental courts martial; but he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the proceedings of a celebrated court martial, which took place a few years ago, which created a great sensation at the time, and to which the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) was probably much indebted for the great reputation he now enjoyed—he alluded to the case of Colonel Crawley. On that occasion the hon. and learned Member made one of the most powerful speeches to the court that he (Mr. Otway) had ever read, and he believed it was entirely owing to the speech that the officer was acquitted.

Several hon. MEMBERS: The speech was read by the prisoner himself.

MR. OTWAY would be glad to hear a reply on this question from the Judge Advocate General, for it was desirable that the Committee should have the advantage of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's experience and legal knowledge. All that he desired was that a soldier should have precisely the same facilities with regard to his defence as an officer. If that were so already he was content; but if it were true that in the case of Colonel Crawley the hon.

and learned Member for Oxford wrote the speech, the prisoner reading it, that was an advantage which, so far as he could understand, a soldier did not enjoy. Until the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) read the Queen's Regulation a short time ago, he was not aware that it was possible for a soldier to have a professional adviser at all, and he certainly was not aware of an instance in which the power had been exercised. He considered that the new clause proposed by the hon. Member for Meath should be accepted by the Committee, subject to the restriction suggested by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke)—namely, that it should not apply to regimental courts martial, but to general and district courts.

COLONEL STANLEY disliked demurring to an Amendment, some part of which he was not indisposed to agree to, but which, on the other hand, he did not quite see his way to, because he was in doubt as to how it would work. It was all very well for hon. Gentlemen to propose clauses in support of which plausible arguments could be advanced; but when it became a question how the clause would work, that was a somewhat different matter. The question, in the present case, was not whether a prisoner should be entitled to employ a legal adviser, but whether, under the guise of allowing the employment of a legal adviser, they should entirely alter the procedure of courts martial. It was necessary to be perfectly clear on this subject. If by a "legal adviser conducting the defence of the prisoner," was meant that counsel should be allowed to address the court, and to act precisely the same as in a civil trial, he confessed that he could hardly assent to that without taking further advice. The acceptance of the clause, in its present form, would involve the complete reversal of what had been the mode of procedure at courts martial from time immemorial. It must also be borne in mind that courts martial differed materially from ordinary Courts of Law in this respect—that, whereas a decision in a Court of Law was final, in courts martial, other than regimental, the proceedings had to be forwarded home for examination and sometimes for revision. On that account, therefore, the practice of putting questions in writing was not, perhaps, quite so foolish as it at first sight appeared. Of course, where shorthand writers were available they might be employed under reasonable restrictions, but that clearly did not obtain everywhere; and to lay down a rule of this sort in an Act of Parliament would not only be fallacious in itself, but it would be found difficult in working. He had no objection, in principle, to a prisoner being represented by a legal adviser; but he did not think it right, subject to whatever further advice he might receive, that the defence of a prisoner should be entirely conducted by counsel—that was to say, that counsel should be able to cross-examine witnesses and make speeches as in an ordinary court. Above all things, it ought to be borne in mind that it was not always certain that the best legal adviser would be obtained; and it was necessary that a person not of a military character appearing before the court should not be put into such a position as to be able, by his superior legal knowledge, to place the court on the horns of a dilemma, and thus, probably, bring about the failure of justice. In most cases the procedure was very simple; and it would be worse than useless to lay down in an Act of Parliament that counsel should be employed. On the whole, therefore, he was afraid that, unless the new clause could be considerably amended, it would be his duty to demur to it.

SIR HENRY JAMES was sorry to be obliged again to trouble the Committee; but he felt called upon to make some remarks in reply to the objection, that by accepting the Amendment they would be altering the procedure of courts martial. That, in his opinion, was a very small objection, especially after they had altered the constitution of the Army itself, having made it a Parliamentary Army, instead of one governed exclusively by the Prerogative of the Crown. To say that justice was not to be done because it would be inconvenient to those who had the conduct of courts martial was a plea which he, for one, could not accept. Under the Bill, civilians were, for the first time, rendered liable to trial by court martial for 26 offences, the punishment for which might be death; and he failed to see why, under such circumstances, the proceedings should not be conducted on the same principle as in ordinary Courts of Law. It could not be denied that putting questions in writing was a very slow process; and the mode in which a prisoner was obliged to address the court in defence was repugnant to one's sense of justice. He saw no particular objection to the exclusion of regimental courts martial from the clause; for if the clause applied to general and district courts there would be a guarantee that prisoners would have the power of being legally represented.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it seemed to him that the contention on the other side was for the shadow, and not the substance, which had been given by the Queen's Regulations. He hoped they would not fight about a shadow. If every single word was to be taken down, and every answer was to be taken down, of course they must have a shorthand writer. That they had not got, and such a proceeding was, indeed, utterly unheard of. As to the appearance of a counsel, he wished to know by whom counsel would be controlled? The military court had no control over him; there was no such provision in the clause. He thought the proposal was a dangerous one. They would have this danger, and it was one which should be considered in the interest of the prisoner. If they were going to have counsel for the prisoner—if they were going to put this enactment in the Bill—they would have a practice of engaging counsel for the prosecution springing up. That, again, they had not got. It was quite clear that if there was counsel for the prisoner there would be a prosecuting counsel as well; and they would be much worse under this regulation than they were at present. Therefore, he hoped the Committee would hesitate before passing this suggestion. The present position of soldiers before the law was, he had no hesitation in saying, better than it would be under the proposal now before the Committee.

MR. MUNTZ said, he did not deny that there were considerable difficulties in this case; but there was one question he should like to ask of the right hon. Gentleman, and that was, why a soldier was to be treated differently on his trial from any other person? Was a soldier undeserving of those securities which were offered to every other person? They had heard a great deal of the difficulty of controlling counsel. Well, but they found no difficulty in magistrates' courts. There was not an Assize Court in England where, if a prisoner was about to be tried for his life, and had no counsel, the Judge would not at once appoint a counsel to defend the party charged? That being the case, was it not an excessive hardship that a soldier should be treated differently? They ought to allow the soldier on his trial the right of having a counsel to advise him. He had heard nothing in the remarks of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite which met the objections of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James); and if the hon. Member for Meath went to a Division he (Mr. Muntz) would vote with him.

COLONEL ALEXANDER referred to the trials of the military prisoners in Ireland. In those cases, for some reason or other, the counsel for the prisoners withdrew from the court, and the trial was postponed until half-past 10 the following morning, to enable the prisoners to have the assistance of counsel. In the case of the trial of Kiley, the same legal adviser again withdrew, and the court announced to the prisoner that it would give him to the next day to employ other counsel, when the court would proceed with the trial, whether the prisoner obtained other counsel or not. It was quite clear there was no difficulty in prisoners obtaining the services of counsel. With regard to the case of Colonel Crawley, the defence, which was prepared, was read badly by Colonel Crawley himself, and the effect wholly spoiled.

MR. COLE said, he was strongly of opinion that military prisoners should have the advantages of having counsel. The Secretary of State for the Home Department said that they had the substance, and that they were only fighting for a shadow; but he contended, on the other hand, that they were fighting for the substance, nothing but the shadow having been left to them. He challenged the Home Secretary on his own ground.

MR. PARNELL only rose to say that if the Committee consented to read the clause he should be happy to adopt the Amendments suggested by the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke).

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 186: Majority 99.—(Div. List, No. 170.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL had on the Paper an Amendment in page 39, after Clause 72, to insert the following clause:—

(Punishment of offences not actually seen by provost marshal.)

“For the punishment of the offences described in section seventy-two of this Act, which are not actually seen by the provost marshal, or which require a more severe punishment than the provost marshal is authorised to inflict, it shall be lawful for the officer commanding any detachment or portion of troops on active service to convene a field court martial, to consist of not less than two officers, and such field court martial may try the person accused of such offence in a summary way, the charge and finding being recorded and an abstract of the evidence being taken in brief, and such field court martial shall be competent to award any punishment which might be awarded by an ordinary regimental court martial;”

but he explained that as the views here embodied had been practically adopted he would not move it. He had also a further clause, after Clause 82, as follows:—

“A soldier of the reserve who has completed or will within one year complete the period for which he was enlisted may give notice to the officer commanding the brigade depot to which he is attached of his desire to continue in Her Majesty's service in the reserve forces, and if that officer considers that he is qualified for farther service, and the competent military authority approve, he may be continued as a soldier of the reserve forces in the same manner in all respects as if his term of service were still unexpired, except that he may claim his discharge at the expiration of any period of three months after he has given notice of his wish to be discharged.”

It was not his intention now to proceed with this clause, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman opposite assured him that the existing law effected the object which he desired.

MR. PARNELL said, his next Amendment was, in page 47, after Clause 86, to insert the following clause:—

(If a discharged soldier or his wife or child becomes chargeable on rates, guardians may recover costs from the War Office.)

“If a person who has been a soldier of the regular forces, or his wife or child, becomes chargeable on the rates for the relief of the poor in the place at which he has taken up his residence, within a period of two years after discharge or transfer, the board of guardians of the union in which he or they become so chargeable, or of any other union to which he or they may have been removed under the laws regulating the removal of paupers, or in which he or they may have subsequently taken up their residence within the aforesaid period of two years, shall be entitled to receive from the War Office the cost which from time to time may be incurred by the union for the support of such person or persons."

He did not propose to proceed with this clause, because, yesterday, they decided a question similar to this. He begged, therefore, to withdraw the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he now moved to insert a clause which was intended to have the same effect as that string of clauses which, unfortunately, he was not here to move, and with regard to which he must apologize to the Committee for not moving. On page 67, after Clause 123, he begged to move to insert the following clause:—

(Power of Judge Advocate General to revise sentence.)

"No finding or sentence of a court martial and no forfeiture or punishment shall be valid in any respect in which the Judge Advocate General shall determine that such finding, sentence, forfeiture, or punishment are not in conformity with law."

In moving this clause, he wished to raise an important point, and he should be glad if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would give his attention to the subject, if possible. He thought it would be a matter of satisfaction to the Committee, and would save time, if the right hon. Gentleman would state to the Committee what he proposed to do with regard to the point in the clause. The question came before the Committee thus. No one who had carefully read the evidence which was given before the Courts Martial Commission could fail to see that there was a certain dissatisfaction with the present procedure. "The ramrod case" had been cited as an instance of the injustice which might be carried on, owing to want of power in the Office of Judge Advocate General. In the case to which he referred, the Judge Advocate General declared that the proceedings were illegal, and yet the sentence was carried out, and justice was refused in the Office of the Secretary of State for War. Now, the question was this—what was the use of the Judge Advocate General? He confessed that the more he studied the question the more difficult he found it to give an answer. The Judge Advocate General was not in the Privy Council—he was not a lawyer—in fact, he had no legal knowledge whatever. This was a state of things which, one would think, could not exist in any civilized country. Now, he was not alluding to any person in particular. It was true that, from time to time, that Office had been filled by men eminent as politicians; but, on the other hand, it was notorious in that House that it had again and again been filled by persons who were not eminent lawyers. That they ought to be lawyers was clear, because they had the evidence of the present occupant of that Office that the finding of some 8,000 courts martial a-year passed under his supervision, and were subjected to legal scrutiny. It was an evidence of the diligence of the present holder of the Office that he was able to say that was the case. What he was aiming at, and what he desired to secure from the Government, was this—that the Office should be placed upon such a footing as that it should be impossible henceforth that it should be made a sinecure. He knew that it was very unpleasant to say, or to imply, what he was implying at that moment; but, nevertheless, he did say that it was an anomaly that there should exist in this country an Office, paid so highly as that of the Judge Advocate General, which should appear to be a mere sinecure. It was so, undoubtedly, at the present moment. He now passed from that part of the subject, and came to the practical portion of his Motion. And he asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War what objection there could be to framing a set of Regulations which should insure—of course, always supposing that the Judge Advocate General was a person who was capable of giving an opinion which was worth having—that the whole of the proceedings of the various courts martial throughout the country should be sent to his Office for revision? The Committee had passed a very important Resolution just now. It had denied all persons before courts martial the right of securing the assistance of a counsel who should proceed before the court martial, as he would do in civil cases. He, therefore, asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman whether the effect of the decision of the Committee was not this—that they were driven back upon such proposals as those which were made by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) before the Courts Martial Committee? He alluded to them just now, and he did so again. One proposal was that there should be present at every court martial a legal assessor, not necessarily a barrister, but a person who had studied military law, and was competent to give an opinion on that law. Whether the presence of such a person at regimental courts martial would be advisable he did not say; but at district and general courts martial there should be present some person who was competent to give an opinion on military law. It was a question, however, whether they might not have another set of officers trained up in military law, who might be present at important regimental courts martial; and he did not think it would be difficult to get officers to study military law, provided that a certain inducement was offered them. But, at all events, with reference to the present proposition—which was only one of a series that he would wish to submit to the Committee—he would point out that it was absolutely essential that the Office of the Judge Advocate General should be strengthened. He would ask that, instead of his being what he understood he was at present, simply a person to whom the cases were referred, and who made reports to the Commander-in-Chief, which he might or might not follow, in his hands should be placed the absolute decision with regard to the correctness or incorrectness, from a legal point of view, of the proceedings which were submitted to him. He wanted to know whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was willing to accept that principle—that the decision of the Judge Advocate General, with regard to the legality of the proceedings of courts martial, should be taken to be absolutely and distinctly irrevocable? He did not wish to detain the Committee any longer; and if he should succeed in eliciting from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman an expression of opinion on this point which was at all satisfactory he would not press the Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) remarked, that the hon. Gentleman had not told the Committee what the effect of the change which he proposed would be. At present, the Judge Advocate General was only an adviser; and the effect of this proposal would be to make him an absolute Judge, whose conclusions would be absolutely final. It seemed to him that that was far too serious a change to introduce here. It would be a total alteration of what the military law was; and the effect of it, so far from being in aid of the persons on whose behalf he seemed to speak, would be against them. The sentence, at all times, was now a thing which, as he understood, the proper authorities might, at any time, remit; but if the hon. Member's proposition was carried, there was an absolute, inexorable, and certain judgment arrived at by the person who was, at present, simply the Law Officer of the military authorities. Was that a desirable alteration? He submitted to the hon. Member himself that it was hardly a desirable thing to do.

MR. RYLANDS said, the hon. and learned Solicitor General, in his remarks, would lead the Committee to believe that the War Office, in dealing with the decisions of courts martial, received the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown. ["No, no!"]

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) explained, that he had only suggested that his right hon. and learned Friend the Judge Advocate General was to the military authorities what the Law Officers of the Crown were to the Government.

MR. RYLANDS said, it came, then, practically, to this—that the decisions of courts martial were subject simply to the review of the War Office. Now, the hon. and learned Solicitor General seemed to think that it would be a very great revolution to give the Judge Advocate General the power of a Judge. No doubt, it would be a very great change upon the present system; but it was one which was recommended by authorities who gave evidence before the Committee which sat last year. The Deputy Judge Advocate General—a gentleman who had probably more experience in this matter than any other man at present engaged in the Public Service—expressed a decided opinion in favour of such a power being given to the Judge Advocate General as that which was proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins). Therefore, when they were told they were going outside what might naturally be expected in a Bill of this kind, he entirely disputed that statement. They were only dealing with a matter which came within the competency of the Committee, to which the subject of the regulation and discipline of the Army, the Mutiny Acts, and the Articles of War were referred. It was only fair to the large number of soldiers who were brought under the control and judgment of courts martial that they should have at the central authority a power which would review irregularities, or correct any improper decisions on the part of those courts martial. He would not trouble the Committee by reading the evidence. [“Hear, hear!”] Hon. Gentlemen said “Hear, hear!” but he would remind them that he was now pleading for justice for a large number of men in the Army who, by reason of ignorance on the part of courts martial, might be treated in a manner not just. He did not say that courts martial would willingly do an injustice; but there could be no doubt whatever that they frequently did an injustice in their findings; and what he was pleading for now was that there should be at the head of the Judge Advocate General’s Department a public official who should, in fact, have the position, and exercise the power, of a Judge. He knew what would follow from the adoption of such a proposal as that contained in his hon. Friend’s clause. They would have to select for that appointment a man of high judicial character, to whom could be referred, with perfect confidence, these responsible duties. The House would then vote the salary of that learned Gentleman with perfect satisfaction; because they would know that, in appointing as Judge Advocate General a man of that high character, position, and experience, they would give a guarantee to the entire Army that this important Office would be fully and properly administered. If they were to continue to place in that Office a gentleman, not because of any judicial acquirements which he possessed, but simply because it suited the political convenience of one Party or another, then they were degrading and prostituting what ought to be a most important and useful Office in connection with the British Army. He entirely repudiated, in the remarks he was making, any intention to be personal. It was not a question of the present occupant. They had had, again and again, Gentlemen appointed to this Office simply on the ground of political convenience. He desired to protest against that. If different considerations governed the appointment, he should say that the Office was one that ought to be continued. But to pay £2,000 a-year, and not to get an absolute return in official competency and work, was to convert the Office into a farce. He wished to remind the Committee that the Office was left vacant for several months entirely for the political convenience of the late Government; and during that period no inconvenience resulted, the duties being performed by the permanent officials. He thought the Committee and the Government should be prepared to deal with this matter in connection with this Bill, as it was for the interest of the Army that the Office should be placed upon a permanent and more satisfactory footing.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that, as he had been so personally referred to in connection with this matter, he hoped the Committee might allow him to say a few words, although he would only speak in very general terms. With regard to the clause before the Committee, he thought his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General had already pointed out what were the objections to it. But the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) had spoken of this Office rather more strongly in connection with other clauses which he had down on the Paper, and had pressed him for his opinion. He felt somewhat in a difficulty; because he did not think, to begin with, that such a subject found its place very conveniently in the Bill, relating, as it did, to an entire change in the conditions of a high Office. However, as the hon. Gentleman had asked for his opinion, he was bound to give, so far as he could, his personal opinion for what it was worth. It would be understood, he hoped, that in all these matters they spoke impersonally, and entirely in relation to the Office. As to what had been said about making the Judge Advocate General a Judge, he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General that there would be a great deal of difficulty in reversing the traditions of that Office. But, what was more, he was not at all sure that, in itself, that would be entirely a change for the better; because as long as the Judge Advocate General continued as a Law Adviser to the military authorities, it seemed to him that the placing him in the position of a Judge would be very inconsistent with the position of responsibility which the Secretary of State, as representative of the military authority, had to assume in that House. It must be borne in mind that the Judge Advocate General's Office was one of greater prominence even than it was at the present time under a former state of things, in which the Secretary at War was not a Secretary of State directly responsible for the whole administration of the War Department. The Judge Advocate General represented, as he might say, the civil side of questions connected with military law in that House, at a time when there was no Secretary of State, and the Secretary at War discharged somewhat different functions. He then was, as it were, civil representative in respect of military law, and the civil adviser of the Commander-in-Chief, and, through him, of the Sovereign. With the appointment of Secretary of State, that position became somewhat changed. Speaking for himself, he must say that he should hail with pleasure any proposal which he thought would strengthen the Office of his right hon. and learned Friend. He should be glad to see the legal element strengthened, if it was not at present strong enough; and he thought his right hon. and learned Friend himself had shown his appreciation of that feeling, inasmuch as one of the officers whom he had lately appointed to the position of Judge Advocate General was a barrister. Then, there was another point raised as to whether it should be a permanent Office in the sense that a Judge's office was permanent, or whether it should be an Office the occupant of which was liable to change from time to time. He must point out that if they were to make such a change in the Office as to place it on the same tenure as that of the Judges, they would entirely reverse the whole traditions of the Office; and the person so appointed could no longer act, as at present, as the Law Adviser on military matters of the Secretary of State. He would be placed in an entirely different position. It seemed to him that if the Judge Advocate General was to be the adviser of the Secretary of State, and to act with him, it became almost a matter of necessity that the Office should be subjected to changes as at the present time. He hoped that the hon. Gentleman would recognize the difficulties which were before them in this matter, and would not press the clause. He would venture to make a further appeal to him not to press the other matters to which he had referred upon the attention of the Committee at the present time; but to allow him an opportunity of taking them into practical consideration, in conjunction with his right hon. and learned Friend the Judge Advocate General.

MR. E. JENKINS said, that although, undoubtedly, the discussion had extended over rather a wide space, yet the question immediately before the Committee was simply an alteration in the law as it at present existed. He wanted to know whether it was true that any finding or sentence was now held to be valid in any respect in which the Judge Advocate General had said it was not in conformity with law? The hon. and learned Solicitor General—he would forgive him for saying so, because he did not wish to imply any failure on his part to apprehend the ordinary meaning of language—had given a wider interpretation to this clause than he (Mr. E. Jenkins) intended. He thought that if the hon. and learned Gentleman looked at it, he would see that it simply asserted in the Bill what was, practically, the case at present. His object was to introduce into this Bill some recognition, on the part of Parliament, of the responsible Office of Judge Advocate General; and if this were granted, he then might listen to the appeal of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. So far as the clause which he had proposed was concerned, he did not see, either from the remarks of the hon. and learned Solicitor General, or those of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, why it should not be passed by the Committee.

Clause negatived.

MR. PARNELL said, he had been accidentally shut out, and, therefore, he was unable to return to the House in time to take up his next clause. He, however, begged now to move, in page 67, after Clause 126, to insert the following clause:—

(Commentary on proceedings during trial.)

"The published commentary by any person on the proceedings of a court martial during the trial or before the finding of the verdict and sentence shall be held to be contempt of such court."

He did not know whether this clause was so clearly drawn that it expressed his meaning; but he would tell the Committee what it was he wished to do. He wished that proceedings before courts martial should be exempted from commentary, in the same way that proceedings in civil courts were exempted from comment; so that the case of the accused person should not be prejudiced by remarks in the Press. At present, when any case was being tried by a court martial, all persons passed judgment on it, and very often this was done with the utmost freedom, and the case was, practically, withdrawn from the court, and became a mere matter of discussion and decision outside. He thought this was a point of considerable weakness in the military procedure, which ought to be remedied by the present Act; and it was with the intention of remedying this weakness that he brought forward this clause. It might be that the clause did not fully express his meaning. It would be quite open to the hon. and learned Attorney General or Solicitor General to amend it in such a way as to make it answer the purpose.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) thought that the Amendment, as at present moved by the hon. Gentleman, was too wide, and would comprehend more than he intended. He thought that the introduction of some words modifying the clause would bring it within the range of the Bill, and so that his right hon. and gallant Friend might accept it.

MR. PARNELL said, he would be willing to withdraw the clause; but what he would suggest was that the hon. and learned Gentleman would kindly take the trouble to draft a clause himself.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that he had no doubt whatever that his hon.

and learned Friend would take that course.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL moved to insert the following clause:—

(Prisons in India and Colonies.)

"No soldiers shall be confined, in prisons other than military prisons, in India and the Colonies where the rules for the government and management of such prisons differ from those made by the Governor General of India and a Secretary of State in the case of India and the Colonies respectively."

He should be willing to insert an Amendment in this clause if the Government agreed in principle to this—that no soldier should be confined longer than was absolutely necessary in other than military prisons.

Clause agreed to.

MR. PARNELL then moved to amend the clause by inserting, after the word "confined," the words "longer than is absolutely necessary."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

MR. PARNELL moved, in page 69, after Clause 131, to insert the following clause:—

(Duration of penal diet.)

"No prisoner shall be sentenced to more than twenty-four hours' penal diet for breach of prison discipline without the order of an authority independent of the governor of the prison."

He would remind the Committee that the Home Secretary held that, in spite of the provisions of the Prisons Act of 1877, a gaoler was still entitled to confine a prisoner in his cell for three days for a breach of discipline. Now, he (Mr. Parnell) had, in Committee on that Bill of 1877, introduced an Amendment that solitary confinement in the punishment cell by order of the gaoler should be confined to 24 hours. He intended, by that clause, to prohibit the gaoler from sentencing a prisoner for breach of discipline to more than 24 hours' imprisonment. Unfortunately, it appeared, according to the interpretation put on that clause, that there was nothing to prevent a gaoler from sentencing a prisoner to more than 24 hours' solitary confinement, provided it was in his own cell, and not in the punishment cell. This sentence of three days' confinement in the prisoner's own cell could be accompanied by penal diet—bread and water. The Committee would bear in mind the distinction which he made between the prisoner's own cell and the punishment cell. Now, the punishment cells were hardly ever used; they were not used because it was found that they did not comply with the provisions of the Act of 1865. It was provided by that Act that the prison authorities should provide—that was, build—a suitable punishment cell. Well, the cells were built; but they were found not suited for the purpose. They were dark, badly-ventilated, and, in many cases, damp, and altogether such cruel places that, instead of confining prisoners in these penal cells, the practice grew up of confining them in their own cells. Now, his contention was that if they confined the prisoner upon bread and water in his own cell, that cell became a punishment cell, and, therefore, that it should be included in the sections of the Prisons' Act of 1877. But the Home Secretary took another view. He considered, as he had said, that the gaolers had power under that Act to confine prisoners in their own cells for more than 24 hours. Now, a great deal of mischief had resulted from this practice of confining prisoners in their own cells without the orders of Visiting Justices, or some independent authority. He objected altogether to gaolers having the power of confining a prisoner in a cell which was, for all practical purposes, a punishment cell for more than 24 hours. The whole experience that they had had of prison punishment and prison discipline showed that gaolers could not be intrusted with this indiscriminate power of ordinary bread and water diet to prisoners, and solitary confinement for breach of discipline; and that it was absolutely necessary to limit the power of the gaolers in some way or another. His attention was first drawn to this subject by the case of the political prisoners. He found it was a common practice to give men who had been sentenced for political offences terms of solitary confinement on penal diet for trifling breaches of discipline. This terrible punishment was inflicted on them at short intervals. Thus a man would have a punishment on penal diet, and he would leave the cell, and in a short time he would have to return to it again for another trifling breach of discipline. The result of this course was soon apparent. It had the strongest and worst effect upon the health of the prisoner, which speedily broke down under it. They had, for instance, the other day, the case of the prisoner Nolan, who died in Clerkenwell, where the gaoler had indiscriminate power of sentencing prisoners to this penal diet, resulting in death in this case. The Coroner's Jury testified that the prisoner Nolan died in consequence of the treatment he received in prison. That treatment consisted of repeated punishments in the shape of confinements to his cell on bread and water diet. He would illustrate how a man might bring himself under this punishment, and how difficult—in fact, how utterly impossible, it was for him to avoid being brought under solitary confinement and penal diet. The new comer—a prisoner, that was, who had not been convicted before—if he could not at once pick his 3 lbs. of oakum, he was ordered to this solitary confinement and penal diet; and the result was that, weakened and reduced, he would be still less able to complete that task than when he first entered on it. Now, 3 lbs. of oakum picking was a very severe task; but to old hands at the work it was easily got over, so that the effect was this. The young soldier who had committed some not very serious offence in his regiment would find that the hardened criminal, through his greater proficiency in oakum picking, would gain all the advantages of the situation, while he was relegated to the terrible ordeal of penal diet. Now, what was this penal diet? It was 16 ozs. of bread per day, with as much water as a man could drink. The man would eat his 16 ozs. at once, and this would be all he would have for 24 hours. What would the effect of this be at the end of three days? A man would be much less able to go through the task; and simply because he was unable to complete that task, and though he might have no desire whatever to shirk his work, he would fail and be punished. He would fail simply because it was physically impossible for him to perform the task; and if he failed he was at once relegated to bread and water, and so gradually he was worn down, and his health completely undermined. The prisoner who entered gaol, under the circumstances which usually accompanied young soldiers, would speedily be reduced physically; and if he failed at first, which was almost certain, he was less able to succeed. Of course, under the penal ordeal which was a constant system of punishment, punishment went on until the prisoner was absolutely rendered physically incapable. This fact was shown so conclusively in many of the cases he had gone into that he did wish the Committee to come to see the question from his point of view. He believed it would not be tolerated if the Committee fully went into the circumstances. The practice was a most pernicious one, and he hoped the Committee would put a stop to it. The practice of repeatedly punishing prisoners was a cruel and stupid one. He wished the power abolished of sentencing a man to more than 24 hours. He wanted the gaolers entirely deprived of the power which they now possessed, and that power handed over to independent authorities.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he certainly sympathized with the object the hon. Member had in view. He understood the hon. Member to wish to prevent what he called the cruel punishment of prisoners in gaol, charged with breaches of prison rules; but when persons were guilty of breaches of discipline it was really very hard to know what was to be done with them. What position were they in now? Some persons objected to prisoners being flogged; others objected to prisoners being put to hard work; others objected to their being put on penal diet. It was difficult to know what to do to please everybody. The hon. Member was wrong in saying that he had paid more attention to this subject than anyone else, for he could assure the hon. Gentleman that he had given very great attention to this subject. By the rules framed in the Prisons Act of 1877, the gaoler was not allowed to inflict on the prisoner confinement to his cell beyond a certain specified period. It had been pressed upon him by a body of Visiting Justices, who were most strongly opposed to the Act of 1877, that the rules which he had made on that subject unduly weakened the hands of the governor of the gaol, and that prisoners who committed breaches of prison discipline must be punished at once, if discipline was to be maintained in the prison. With regard to the case of Nolan, he must remind the Committee that there was a most independent inquiry in that case, and that those who conducted that inquiry came to an entirely different conclusion from that arrived at by the jury. So far as the next Amendment of the hon. Member was concerned—he meant the classification of prisoners—he had no objection whatever to it, but had always been of opinion that such classification should be made; and a Committee had already been appointed by the War Office in connection with the subject. He hoped the Committee would not enter at that period, in any lengthened way, on a discussion of that subject.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he thought this was a most important question, and he hoped the Committee would bear in mind that these gaolers were not men who ought to be trusted with such enormous powers as were given to them. He had known cases where gaolers had punished prisoners with very great severity. As a general rule, the gaolers were a hardened class that had to do with a very bad class of men; and so, in time, they became hardened to the punishment, which, with the greatest ease, they were ready to inflict upon those placed under their power. He had himself moved, some six weeks ago, for a Return showing the punishments inflicted, in one particular gaol by a particular individual, and showing, also, the number of persons who had been driven mad by the punishments inflicted by that particular gaoler. This case occurred in his own county; and it would show to the House what had been done by the cruelty and hardships inflicted on prisoners by this gaoler. He thought it was very wrong to give the gaoler power to confine a man for 72 hours on bread and water. It was said, what were they to do with prisoners, then, who committed these breaches of discipline? He said that the Amendment gave power to give 24 hours' penal diet and solitary confinement; and he thought that was quite sufficient power to place in the hands of any man. He could not see any objection to this Amendment. He regretted, exceedingly, that he had not his Return now, to place before the Committee the result of the treatment given in gaols by the gaolers. He trusted that the Government would not refuse to accede to this humane clause.

Mr. Parnell

MR. PARNELL said, he did not think there would be any use in dividing the Committee; but he should return to this question, either on the Estimates or at any other possible opportunity, until he had brought the Home Secretary round to his own way of thinking. He had looked into the Prisons Acts of 1865 and 1867, and in none of the sections was there any authority to a gaoler to confine a prisoner in his own cell for three days. The Act authorized a gaoler to confine a prisoner in a penal cell for three days; but there had never been the power to confine a prisoner in his own cell. He begged leave to withdraw the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

(Classification of prisoners.)

"Whereas it is expedient that a clear difference should be made between the treatment of prisoners convicted of breaches of discipline and the treatment of prisoners convicted of offences of an immoral, dishonest, shameful, or criminal character, a Secretary of State shall, from time to time, make rules for the classification and treatment of such prisoners."

Clause agreed to.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE moved, in page 83, after Clause 150, to insert the following clause:—

(Purchase-money not to be forfeited unless court so directs.)

"An officer who joined the Army before the abolition of purchase, when sentenced by court martial to be cashiered or dismissed the Service, shall not forfeit any portion of any sum of money he may be entitled to receive from the Army Purchase Commissioners, unless the sentence of the court otherwise directs."

The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, that he had put this Amendment upon the Paper because there were two classes of officers now in the Army—the purchase officer and the non-purchase officer. At the present time the purchase officers numbered 2,624, or about one-half of the total number of competent officers in the Army. If a purchase officer were tried by a court martial, he was not only sentenced to be cashiered, but he was also made to forfeit the purchase money of his commission. The value of that commission might be from £1,000 to £8,400. This Bill bore very unfairly upon purchase officers; no soldier could be tried twice for the same offence; but the purchase officers were worse off than soldiers, for they were subject to two penalties. When Lord Cardwell introduced into the House the measure abolishing purchase, he stated that the purchase officers would be placed in no worse position by the abolition of purchase than they were in before. But they were now in a much worse position than before, for they were punished twice for the same offence. He did not see how the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could refuse to accept his Amendment.

New Clause (Major O'Beirne) brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

COLONEL STANLEY did not think that the Committee would be justified in assenting to the Amendment, for it would produce an entire change in the position of officers, and he did not think that the change ought to be made. At the present time, an officer who had purchased his commission had repaid to him what he had invested by the advantage he obtained in reaching a superior rank before other officers would do so. He had paid to him the regulation, or over-regulation, value of his commission for the advantages he had received; and it seemed to him that it would be a strongly disadvantageous step if they were to say that such officers, although cashiered or dismissed the Service, should be repaid previously. It would be placing the non-purchase officer in a very disadvantageous position. What was laid down by Lord Cardwell was that the purchase officers should be in as good a position after the passing of the Act as they were before. When an officer was cashiered or dismissed it was always known that his commission was not saleable. No officer would have given, or would have been allowed to give, any money for that commission, and it would have been allowed to go to the next senior officer without purchase. So far, therefore, as concerned the position of an officer sentenced to be cashiered or dismissed, he would stand, since the abolition of purchase, as well as before, disentitled to receive back any portion of his purchase money. The hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) had put a question to him with regard to this matter; and, in reply, he had stated that if a purchase officer were cashiered or dismissed the sentence ipso facto caused forfeiture of his purchase money. He did not think it right that a purchase officer should be placed in a better position than a non-purchase officer. The money he had paid had been for the advantages which he had enjoyed, and for those reasons he could not accept the Amendment.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME said, that the clause proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim was almost the same as one that he proposed at an earlier stage of the Bill, but which he withdrew on an appeal from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. His Amendment received considerable support from all sides of the House, and it was supported by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), and the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute). Subsequently, a question was asked with regard to the matter, and it was stated by the Secretary of State for War that Her Majesty had power to direct the payment of the money to which he would otherwise be entitled from the Army Purchase Commissioners to any purchase officer who had been sentenced to be cashiered or dismissed the Service by court martial. It was, however, pointed out that when sentenced to be dismissed or cashiered a purchase officer ipso facto forfeited the money to which he would have been entitled had he retired by his own free will. As the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim had placed this clause upon the Paper, he should give it his support. He thought that it was quite right that it should be within the power of a court martial to direct or to prevent a forfeiture of the purchase money, and not to leave it to be forfeited, as a matter of course. He hoped that the clause would be agreed to.

MR. OTWAY did not think the answer of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to this Amendment was perfectly satisfactory. He wished to support the Amendment which had been brought forward. How could a purchase and a non-purchase officer be said to be on an equality under the present system?

Colonel Stanley

Suppose two officers were tried for the same offence at the same time, a court martial might sentence them both to be cashiered. The one officer, who had paid nothing for his commission, lost nothing; but the purchase officer forfeited a considerable sum of money. He did not think that could be called justice. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said that an officer who had been so treated had obviously derived some benefit from his purchase. That argument was answered during the discussion on the purchase. He remembered pointing out that the better plan would be for the Government to assess the loss or gain which the officer who had purchased his commission had really obtained. If they took the case of a man who derived no benefit from his purchase, the argument of his right hon. and gallant Friend fell to the ground. What advantage did an ensign obtain over any other officer? Supposing he paid £450 for his commission, and was cashiered, he would lose the money he had invested without having gained any advantage. That seemed to be an unanswerable argument. He must say that it was hardly likely that hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were usually so opposed to their views on that side of the House, should join with them in supporting the Amendment, unless they had a very strong opinion on the matter. Though with every desire to promote the Bill, he felt bound, in justice, to support the Amendment.

COLONEL ALEXANDER observed, that there was a certain difference between purchase and non-purchase officers existing prior to the abolition of purchase in 1871. There were always a certain number of officers who obtained promotion without purchase. The same conditions were in existence before the abolition of purchase as at present with respect to forfeiture of purchase money.

GENERAL SHUTE said, that there was an unquestionable difference between the position of officers who had purchased and those who had not. A purchase officer had his money, as it were, staked on his life and military conduct—that was to say, it would only be forfeited by death or his being dismissed the Service by the sentence of a court martial, and the advantage he gained by having expended this money was that formerly he obtained his promotion so much the quicker. The man who got his promotion without purchase was years in doing it under the old system; but now the purchase officer had no advantage whatever. Supposing there were two junior captains in one regiment, one of whom was a purchase officer, and the next below him was a non-purchase officer. The non-purchase officer would for the last eight years have obtained promotion quite as quickly as his comrade, who had paid for his position. Supposing, then, that these two captains were cashiered for the same offence, the one having purchased one or two of his earlier steps would, from the fact of his being dismissed the Service, be fined the value of them, whilst the other could not be subjected to any pecuniary penalty. He was in favour of the Amendment to place a discretionary power, as to the forfeiture of purchase money, in the hands of a court martial.

MR. HARDCASTLE said, that perhaps it might be impertinent for a civilian to address any argument to the Committee upon such a subject as this; but it did appear to him that there was a clear distinction between an officer who had not purchased his commission, but had obtained it by promotion before the abolition of purchase, and a non-purchase officer at the present moment. Before the abolition of purchase an officer who had obtained his commission by promotion was possessed of a saleable article, and was in the same position as an officer who had purchased his commission. Now, a non-purchase officer lost not the value of his commission—for that was no longer saleable—but the purchase officer, who was entitled to compensation for the value of his commission, would lose that as well as the commission, and thus suffered a double punishment.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE remarked, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had told them nothing of the disadvantages to which purchase officers had been subjected since the abolition of purchase. They were now obliged to accept compulsory retirement, and had lost many advantages.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME wished to bring one single point to the notice of the Committee. The Bill which they were now discussing introduced offences, more or less venial, for which officers might be cashiered or dismissed the Service. He was sure that the Committee would support him when he said that this might bear unfairly upon purchase officers.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 135: Majority 90.—(Div. List, No. 171.)

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he had two Amendments on the Paper; he did not propose to move the first, but the second he should move. Clause 152 gave power to move military offenders from one place to another, and to keep them in the place to which they were removed. It appeared to him that that clause, to a certain extent, set a dangerous precedent. Under that clause people might fancy that they would be justified in moving people from one district to another for an ulterior purpose. For instance, under Clause 152 persons might be moved from a district in which there was no martial law to a district where martial law was in force. In Gordon's case, a Member of the Kingston Legislature was taken into a district where martial law existed from one where it was not in force. By that means he was put to death, and the Lord Chief Justice of England had said that that act was something very like murder. He begged to move, after Clause 152, to insert the following clause:—

(No person to be subject to any penalties other than those to which he would be liable if tried in the place where offence was committed.)

“No person shall be subject to any punishment or penalties other than those which could have been inflicted if he had been tried in the place where the offence was committed.”

Clause agreed to.

MAJOR NOLAN proposed to insert, after the word “penalties” in the last clause, “under the provisions of this Act.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 109, before First Schedule, insert Schedule—

"Offences punishable with corporal punishment on active service.

"All offences under this Act punishable with death."

Amendment agreed to.

First Schedule agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in Schedule 2, page 110, line 26, to leave out all the words after the word "horse."

Amendment agreed to.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had an Amendment on the 2nd Schedule.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had moved to leave out the second part of the Schedule, as he intended to place it in an annual Bill.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to know where they were, as it was impossible to tell what was going on in the Benches where he sat? He wanted to know what course the Government proposed to take with reference to the billeting clauses, as to which he had an Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that an Amendment proposed to the 2nd Schedule by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had been agreed to, and the second part of the 2nd Schedule had been struck out. The Question, then, before the Committee was, that the 2nd Schedule, as amended, should be the 2nd Schedule of the Bill.

MAJOR NOLAN: I wish to point out that the Government have been dodging this in an ingenious way.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member must see that the expression he had used was one which exceeded the rules of debate.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he brought forward this question three years ago. Lord Cranbrook then declared that if he did not raise the question the Government would themselves bring it forward. During the course of this Bill he had four times asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to appoint a Proprietary Committee. That was the only way of dealing with it. Such a Committee could discuss the whole question of prices. The last time he mentioned it the Secretary of State said it was unnecessary, because it could be moved in the Act which was only to be put in force by another Act. It seemed that now the Government had taken the matter out of this Act with a view of putting it into an annual Act, so that he would not be able to bring it on. The Government were not behaving with ordinary candour over this matter. If a declaration were not made, on the part of the Government, that this matter should go before a Proprietary Committee, he should feel it his duty to propose to report Progress.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that nothing approaching to an undertaking had been given in this matter. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had raised the question very fairly at the earlier stages of the Bill. They did not then think that it was advisable to put the prices into the Bill, but considered it would be more convenient to place them in the Schedule. He was asked whether it should be made an Instruction to the Committee to consider the question of prices. Ultimately, it was thought better to take these prices from the Schedule of the Annual Bill, so that Parliament might have control over them from time to time. Therefore, he had proposed to strike out the second part of Schedule 2; and, at the proper time, he would move that it should be an Instruction to the Committee to fix the prices.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that the remarks of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had changed the whole matter.

Second Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule 3 agreed to.

Schedule 4 agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, that the new Schedule be read a second time.

MR. OTWAY said, that as the Schedule dealt with corporal punishment, he should like to know whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was prepared to accept his Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. Member for Rochester did not appear to him to be in Order upon the new Schedule. The proposed new Schedule was a list of those offences which, by Clause 44, were punishable with death, and for these the Schedule now before the Committee provided corporal punishment. The hon. Member would be in Order in moving any exception to the list; but he would not now be in Order in moving an Amendment upon the enacting part of the Bill. He wished to point out to the hon. Member that an Amendment to this Schedule must be either by way of exception or addition to.

MR. OTWAY would bow to the decision of the Chair. It appeared to him, however, that his Amendment came within the terms of the ruling.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that on the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) and the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), it had been agreed to consider the whole subject of corporal punishment upon Report.

MR. OTWAY admitted that when he put down his Amendment it was for the purpose of raising the question of flogging. Now this question had been so much discussed, he did think this Amendment worthy of consideration. Surely it was not desirable that this punishment should be inflicted upon soldiers by their comrades. He had, however, no desire to prolong the discussion.

Schedule agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 245.]

COLONEL STANLEY said, that arrangements were made by which the Bill would be printed, and would be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow (Wednesday morning). If it was not possible to deliver the Schedules with the Bill, there would be a second delivery, both at the House and at the residences of hon. Members.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND) BILL.

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

REGINA v. ORTON.

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY gave Notice that, to-morrow, he would ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, considering the evidence that has been brought to his notice since the conviction of the claimant to the Tichborne estates in February 1874, and the fact that, according to usage, the sentence passed upon him for swearing that he was not Arthur Orton would expire on the 10th of August next; considering, also, the grave legal doubts that the Court had power to give more than one sentence for a supposed perjury, and that the jury had made certain statements as to the circumstances under which they found their verdict, he will advise Her Majesty to liberate the prisoner on the 10th of August next; and, if not, whether he will forthwith investigate the numerous matters to which his attention has been called in support of the identity of the claimant with Roger Tichborne; whether it was true that Her Majesty's Ministers, or any of them, advised the Queen to send a telegram of sympathy to Lady Radcliffe, congratulating her upon the result of the trial; and whether, as a matter of fact, the trial has not cost the country more than a quarter of a million of money?

MR. SPEAKER: I have to point out to the hon. Member that it appears to me that parts of his Notice involve matters of argument, and, so far, it is irregular. I am not prepared at this moment to state in what shape the Question ought to be put.

DR. KENEALY: When my attention was called to this objection by one of the Clerks of the House I most carefully considered the Question, and did what I could to illuminate my mind from Sir Erskine May's work; but I have been unable to find anything contrary to the Rules of the House in my Question.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

[Lords.]—[BILL 114.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER), in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said: Sir, a Bill to consolidate and amend the Law of Bankruptcy has been passed through the other House of Parliament, and I now rise for the purpose of asking this House to consent to the measure being read a second time. As the House is aware, a Bill on the subject of Bankruptcy was introduced in the House of Lords in 1876, and again in 1877. In the latter year, the measure was approved by the noble Lords, and sent down to this House, where it was read a second time, and, as far as I could judge from the discussion which arose, gave almost universal satisfaction. Owing to causes, however, the nature of which I need not explain, the Bill was not proceeded with by the Government. Since the Session of 1877 the subject has been further carefully investigated and considered, and several alterations have been made in the original Bill—I mean the Bill of 1877—which I believe will be found great improvements. The Bill which I ask leave to read a second time is composed of the original measure, with the alterations to which I have referred. There have been several Acts within comparatively recent times designed to alter and improve the Law of Bankruptcy; but it seems an unfortunate subject, because measure after measure has been attempted, and measure after measure has failed to remedy the evils complained of. I think I need only refer to two of them—the Act of 1861, and the Act of 1869. Prior to the Act of 1861 the system which prevailed, and which had prevailed for some time, was what may be called essentially a system of officialism. The Court of Bankruptcy and the officers of that Court had practically the control of the proceedings, and little or no power was confided to the creditors. In 1861, however, it was thought expedient to make a considerable alteration, and, accordingly, by a Bill introduced by Sir Richard Bethell, then Attorney General, a much greater amount of power was conferred upon the creditors than they had been invested with for some time previously. The measure, however, was not a success, and in 1869 another Bill was brought in by Sir Robert Collier, by which the authority of creditors over the estate of the debtor was still further extended, and their powers still further increased. The Act of 1869 may, indeed, I think, be said to have completely put an end to officialism. This Act was, I consider, a carefully-prepared measure, and one which was founded upon correct principles; for it seems to me that it is only reasonable that when a man becomes bankrupt the creditors should have the right to superintend the winding-up and distribution of the estate, and also the right—within limits—to decide whether their debtor shall be wholly discharged from his liabilities. The Act of 1869, though it was much applauded for a time, was found, by experience, not to work as well as was expected—in that it did not accomplish all that was desired. The truth is, the Act would work well enough, if creditors would only condescend to give themselves a little trouble about their own affairs, and not exhibit the apathy and indifference with regard to them which they do exhibit. It seems to me that when a creditor in England—for our Scotch friends are more prudent, cautious, and canny—is informed that his debtor is unable to pay and obliged to resort to the Bankruptcy Court, he generally, I dare say, gives vent to his feelings in a few passionate exclamations, and some strong language; but having done this, he takes his ledger, writes off the amount owing as a bad debt, and pays no further attention to the matter. This supineness and apathy on the part of creditors, in my opinion, has resulted in much evil, and the administration of the Bankruptcy Law has, I regret to say, of late years become a perfect scandal. There must be something wrong when I find from the Report of the Controller in Bankruptcy that, under the existing system, the cases of compositions of the worst kind—that is, those averaging only a few pence in the pound—were ten times as many in 1878 as in 1870. Furthermore, in 1878, in the case of one-half the total number of compositions, only about 1s. 6d. in the pound was paid, and in cases of liquidations although there was a vast number of them in 1878—6,356—half the liquidating debtors gave up nothing more than as much property as would defray the expenses of carrying out the resolution to liquidate. The object of the present Bill is not in any way to depart from the principle upon which the Act of 1869 is founded, or in any way to take away the power and the control of the creditors, and to revert to any system of officialism; but the Bill is designed to introduce certain safeguards and checks which shall have the effect of preventing the evils which at present arise from the indifference of creditors, and of securing the due management and administration of the estates, and it is also intended in some other respects to place the law upon a more satisfactory footing. The first alteration in the law which is effected by the present measure, and to which I desire to draw attention, has reference to the nature of the proceedings to be instituted against a man who is unable to pay his debts. This alteration, however, as will be perceived, is not one of those to which I have alluded as having been rendered necessary by the apathy of the creditors. At present, if a man is unable to discharge the claims made against him, and a petition is presented by a creditor for the purpose of making him bankrupt, an adjudication in Bankruptcy at once takes place. Perhaps, if the debtor is a person backed by a great number of friends, or if he is not over scrupulous and does not hesitate to resort to unworthy tricks, he may avoid a declaration of Bankruptcy by resorting to a liquidation by arrangement—a gentle and gentlemanly-like process of white-washing, to which I shall presently allude. But if the debtor is not a man of this kind, although he may have fallen into misfortune through no fault of his own, and have been perfectly straightforward and honest in all his dealings, he is at once, before any opportunity of investigating his affairs, and of ascertaining what has been his conduct has been afforded, adjudicated a bankrupt. The result is, that very frequently a man who has shown himself most thoroughly honourable in all his dealings, and at whose door no particle of blame can be laid, finds himself subjected to the stigma of bankruptcy—a stigma which, however lightly it may be regarded by some, is, to the great bulk of men, an occasion of serious annoyance, and to a sensitive mind an occasion of intense suffering. Now, then, the remedy for this evil contemplated by this Bill is this. It is enacted that the first result of a petition in Bankruptcy, either by a creditor against a debtor, or by a debtor against himself—for it is proposed, under the provisions of the measure, that a debtor shall be enabled to petition against himself—shall be, that the property of the debtor shall be vested immediately in a trustee, and consequently secured for the benefit of the creditors; then, that the affairs of the debtor and his conduct shall be subjected to a searching investigation, and that pending this investigation the order for adjudication in Bankruptcy shall be provisional only. Whether the debtor will be adjudicated bankrupt or not will depend upon the result of the investigation of his affairs, and upon the opinion his creditors may be led to form of his conduct. If that opinion is favourable to the debtor, he may be discharged at once without any further proceedings; or it may be that the creditors will think it right that the debtor's affairs shall be wound up under a deed of arrangement, or that a composition be accepted. The advantage of this provision is, that it necessitates a careful consideration of the debtor's position, and prevents injustice being inflicted; but, at the same time, it at once removes from the debtor the power of dealing with his estate, and secures it at the earliest possible moment for the benefit of the whole of his creditors. Judging from some pamphlets which have been circulated, there appears to be some exception taken by a good many professional trustees, accountants, and fourth or fifth-rate solicitors outside this House to this proposal to substitute a Provisional Order for an immediate adjudication in Bankruptcy, and elaborate endeavours have been made to demonstrate that the working of the proposed system would, or might possibly, occasion some additional expense, in that it will increase the number of applications required to be made to the Court. Sir, I have given the matter much consideration, and I am convinced that it is a mere invention of the gentlemen I have referred to, and that, as a rule, no additional expense will result from the adoption of the proposal contained in the Bill; but surely it will be a great improvement, and the removal of a great injustice, to provide that a man shall not be declared a bankrupt until his creditors have had some chance of considering his conduct and of investigating his affairs; and even if it could be shown—which I deny—that this amendment of the existing law may have to be purchased at the risk of slightly increasing the cost of the proceedings in certain exceptional cases, we ought not, I think, to complain. With reference to the proposal to resort to a Provisional Order, in the first instance, that proposal has the sanction of a Committee of gentlemen of the greatest experience in Bankruptcy matters—namely, Mr. Rupert Kettle, Mr. James R. Brougham, Mr. Mansfield Parkyns, Mr. Henry Nicol, and Mr. W. Hackwood—who were, in 1875, appointed to consider the working of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. In their Report the Committee say—“Proceedings in bankruptcy are now commenced by the action of an individual creditor, who, in most cases, knows nothing of his fellow creditors, nor does he act for or in concert with them. By the proceedings of such single creditor a dilatory and an expensive contest is sometimes carried on as to whether or not adjudication of bankruptcy shall be made, and the adjudication is often set aside by the action of the body of the creditors as soon as they can exercise the provisions of Section 28 of the Statute. It is reversing the proper order of events to provide that an adjudication should be made in the first instance and the conduct of the debtor be inquired into afterwards. The result of the inquiry may be, and often is, to find the debtor to be undeserving the stigma of bankruptcy which has been already cast upon him. While preventing the hasty judgment upon uncertain information by which it sometimes happens a debtor seeking liquidation is forced into bankruptcy, or, as more frequently happens, a fraudulent debtor is discharged by vote at the first meeting, we think it would be proper to preserve to the creditors the right to consider, after full and accurate information has been laid before them, the conduct of the debtor and his right to his discharge. We therefore think it desirable that the present mode of instituting proceedings, whether in bankruptcy or liquidation, should be altered so that the first order of the Court, whether upon petition of a creditor or a debtor, should be limited in its operation to the possession and administration of property and should not in the first instance affect the personal status of the debtor, and that it should be left to a subsequent stage of the proceedings for the creditors, at a meeting to be held for that purpose, to determine whether or not the debtor should be publicly adjudicated bankrupt.”

The next alteration—and I will make bold to say improvement—of the law effected by the Bill to which I think it necessary to refer, is the abolition, the entire abolition, of liquidations by arrangement. As the House is aware, under the provisions of the 125th section of the Act of 1869, which provides for liquidation by arrangement, a man who is unable to meet his engagements may summon a general meeting of his creditors practically when and where he pleases, and obtain a resolution that his affairs shall be wound up by liquidation, and not in Bankruptcy. I am not going to say that all liquidations are to be condemned; far from it. Many of them, no doubt, are conducted in a satisfactory manner. Innocent debtors obtain their release without being compelled to submit to the disgrace, or fancied disgrace, of bankruptcy, and the estates are properly distributed among the creditors; and, perhaps, I may lay down that, as a rule, liquidations would be unobjectionable if debtors were incapable of resorting to unworthy contrivances to secure the votes of the creditors and those who represent them, and if creditors would decline to allow themselves to be made use of as tools to forward the views of their debtors. Unfortunately, however, it often happens that a liquidation is only used as the means for procuring a comfortable discharge for a culpable and, may be, a fraudulent debtor; and, on the other hand, often ends in a shameful waste of his estate. The reason why this result is brought about may be ascertained without much difficulty. The debtor has power, as I have said, to convene the meeting of his creditors wherever and whenever he pleases, and it is obviously his interest to summon it at an inconvenient time, and probably at an inconvenient place. The creditors are apathetic as usual, and do not care to attend themselves, but are content to confide their votes and interests to persons whom they appoint their proxies. In the meantime the debtor and his accountant are active; they get a few friendly creditors, or perhaps persons who merely pretend to be creditors, to attend the meeting. The support of the proxy-holders is begged, or perhaps more frequently bought, and the debtor and his supporters are placed in complete command of the situation; and, being in this position, they appoint a trustee who is simply their tool, and the trustee appoints a solicitor, who is also to be a creature of the debtor. Of course, the consequence is, that whatever misconduct the debtor may have been guilty of is carefully concealed from the public. He obtains his release as a matter of course, has perhaps a considerable allowance voted to him, and then the trustee, who is, in many cases, at the same time, the accountant of the debtor, proceeds to realize the estate and to deal with it—that is to say, to transfer as much of it as he possibly can to his own pocket, and to the pockets of those in his service, and those whom he is desirous of favouring. If the creditors cannot be induced to attend to their own affairs, of course the result is, that the debtor and the debtor's friends do as they like, as I have shown. Perhaps hon. Gentlemen may ask—"How can it be that such waste of the estate is permitted?" The answer is, that under the present law, if the creditors are indifferent, there is no check upon the proceedings of the trustee, as there is no provision in the Act of 1869 for the audit of the accounts in cases of liquidation by arrangement. Now, Sir, if such cases as those which I have just described, in colours, I suspect, sadly too subdued, occurred only rarely, perhaps there would be no great necessity for complaint; but I regret to say that they happen over and over again, and have given rise to a great public scandal. The remedy which we propose for this evil is one of a very simple, but, at the same time, of a very comprehensive character. It is no half-measure, but it involves the entire sweeping away of liquidation by arrangement. It must not, however, be supposed that under the present Bill no arrangement will be admissible between a debtor and his creditors without resort to Bankruptcy. The truth is, there are very elaborate provisions for such arrangements; but these arrangements are to be effected by deeds, which may be objected to by any of the creditors, and are not to be valid until confirmed by the Court. Moreover, it will be required that the creditors shall not only give their assent to these deeds, but that they shall show their assent by affixing their signatures personally to the instrument. This will have the effect of forcing creditors to attend to their own affairs, and it will also preclude their giving assent to arrangements with which they are not thoroughly acquainted. There is another evil in the present law to which I think I ought to allude. It arises out of the enactments with respect to compositions. Under Section 126 of the Act of 1869, the creditors of a debtor unable to meet his debts may, without proceedings in Bankruptcy being resorted to, by an extraordinary resolution resolve that a composition shall be accepted. This resolution, which binds creditors who dissent, is passed and confirmed at meetings where those holding proxies for creditors can vote as well as creditors themselves. The consequence is, that compositions are constantly accepted which ought not to be accepted, and minorities are forced to submit to unfair and inadequate terms fixed, perhaps, by persons who have really no interest in the matter. Now, the Bill will remove this source of injustice, because, under it, if compositions are accepted, they must be compositions agreed upon and fixed by deed, which is not to be binding unless the Court shall be satisfied with regard to it, and, moreover, it must be a deed signed by the creditors, and not by their proxies. There is, moreover, ample opportunity given to the minority of the creditors to object to a composition which they may think unreasonable. Besides the alterations in the existing law to which I have already alluded, the Bill makes several others which are of great importance. I will not refer to them all, for time will not permit; but I must say a word on one or two. There is a provision that the accounts of all trustees, whether trustees under bankruptcies, or trustees under deeds of arrangement, shall be subject to audit and be periodically and thoroughly overhauled. Then, again, it is enacted that limits shall be put upon the charges of the trustees, and that it shall not be competent for the committee of inspection to vote any amount of remuneration or sanction any amount of expenditure they may think proper. Furthermore, it is provided that all unclaimed dividends shall be periodically paid over by the trustees in whose hands the monies may be to persons duly appointed to collect the same on behalf of the Crown. Under the present law, these sums, often very large, and amounting probably in the aggregate to some millions, remain in the hands of the trustees, who, of course, are not particularly anxious to hand them over to anyone, or to find out the persons who are entitled to them. Now, these sums would be paid to the Government, and taken for the general good of the community, of course making due provision for their being paid over to the persons entitled on the claim being proved. In that way, they would not be left as now in the pockets of persons who have no possible claim to them. Again, there is a clause in the Bill which enlarges the area of the district of the London Bankruptcy Court; and with regard to that Court itself, there is also an important alteration, which I will refer to very briefly. Under the Act of 1869 there was a Judge appointed called the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, and it was enacted that he should preside over the London Bankruptcy Court. Now, without in the slightest degree wishing to cast any reflection upon the Judge who holds that Office, I wish to point out that the duties of that Office have been carried out in a way which can scarcely have been contemplated by the Legislature. I should imagine that it was the intention of the Legislature that the Chief Judge was really to be the Judge by whom all questions of importance were to be heard and decided. In practice, however, this has not been done, but the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy has delegated his powers to the Registrars; and now he transacts only a very limited amount of original business, but occupies such portion of his time as is devoted to bankruptcy work in hearing appeals from the decisions of those Registrars, or from the County Courts, which are the provincial Courts of Bankruptcy. That system has been the subject of much complaint from the commercial community, and a provision has been inserted in the Bill by which the practice is not to prevail any longer; but the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy is to be under an obligation to dispose of all business of importance, whether original or appellate. Moreover, it is proposed that the London Bankruptcy Court shall be made a branch of the High Court of Justice, and the Judge will, therefore, be a Judge of the High Court. Provisions are also inserted in the Bill for the prosecution and punishment of debtors who are guilty of certain specified offences, such as the failure to disclose the estate, reckless trading, and the want of proper books of accounts. A provision is also made for the suspension of the debtor's order of discharge. These, then, are the main provisions of the measure to which I will ask the House to give a second reading. I have, in conclusion, only a word or two to say respecting the Notices of Opposition which I observe appear upon the Paper with reference to the measure. I find to my dismay that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) moves its rejection. I do not deny that I was prepared to meet with a certain amount of opposition from those interested in maintaining the present state of things, from trustees, from accountants, and those who were likely to be appointed trustees, as well as from fourth or fifth-rate solicitors, who have fattened upon the system and the lucrative spoil it yields; but I certainly was not prepared to have seen a Notice of Opposition from my hon. and learned Friend, whose sole object in everything he says and does is to advance and secure the interests of the Commonwealth. But I have discovered that my hon. and learned Friend is possessed with a notion which compels him to take his present course. I know my hon. and learned Friend is beyond any suspicion of opposing the Bill from motives of the kind to which I have referred, and I can only suppose that he is going to oppose the measure on grounds which he has before expressed in regard to the existence of any Bankruptcy Law at all. My hon. and learned Friend appears to think that a Bankruptcy Law is altogether a mistake, and that a man should be made to retain his liabilities to the end of his life, or until he has discharged them—in fact, that a man should not be allowed to resume trading until he had paid his debts. I can scarcely think such a view will be accepted by the House. I believe it is necessary to have some Bankruptcy Law, and I hope, if the House should come to that conclusion, my hon. and learned Friend will agree that the present Bill is the best which can be devised. The next and only other Notice on the Paper referring to the Bill is a Notice of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) to refer the Bill to a Select Committee—a desire which I believe is shared in by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone). My anxiety is that the Bill should be passed; and, if I were not hampered and embarrassed by that anxiety, I would willingly say, by all means let the matter go before a Select Committee. But I think it probable that such a course would only lead to a protracted inquiry, for in a Bill of this kind, no doubt, in a Select Committee each Member of the Committee would have a chance of airing his own particular crotchet, and perhaps of getting it accepted; but would the House accept the decision of the Committee and agree that it should be binding? I think the House would do no such thing, and, therefore, I am altogether against a Select Committee. We have had a recent instance of how the House has treated a Bill which has been referred to a Select Committee. All I can say to the hon. Gentlemen who ask for a reference to a Select Committee is that I would willingly consent to their proposal if they can give me a guarantee that the House will accept the views which that Committee may express. I beg now, Sir, to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. SERJEANT SIMON, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time upon that day three months, said: If I needed any justification for the course I am taking, and for the views I am about to express, I should find it in the speech we have just heard. My hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney General), referring to the legislation which has taken place on bankruptcy since 1861, said it had been unfortunate. He showed its shortcomings, and, in point of fact, the impossibility of ever passing a satisfactory measure. Sir, I will go further back than the year 1861—I will go back to the first Bankruptcy Act which we had in this country, to the reign of Henry VIII. I will show how utterly futile all attempts at bankruptcy legislation have been during the long period since Bankruptcy Law was introduced down to the present time. By the Statute of Henry VIII., bankrupts were treated and dealt with as criminals. During the following reigns of Queen Elizabeth and James I., to the time of Queen Anne, that continued to be the case. In the Statute of James I., the bankrupt was styled "the offender," and was punished accordingly. In fact, there was a Statute of James I., under which he was liable to be placed in the pillory and have one of his ears cut off. Sir Edward Coke, referring to the system of bankruptcy for which this severe legislation had been deemed necessary, spoke of the Bankruptcy Laws as an "innovation," and declared that "they had brought with them all the crimes and evils of the foreign countries from which they had been imported." From that time down to the present there have been speeches in this House, including the one we have listened to to-day, complaining of the inefficiency of bankruptcy legislation, and of the unremedied and growing evils under it. We have had denunciations of fraudulent debtors, we have heard complaints of the wrongs of creditors; and during the time of which I am speaking, from Henry VIII., down to the present reign, we have had, on an average, no less than one Bankruptcy Statute in every 10 years, and, in the course of the last 40 years, we have had alterations in the Bankruptcy Law, on an average, between every five and six years. Let me show the House, for a moment, what has taken place. In 1825 we had a Bankruptcy Law passed; there was another in 1826, another in 1831, another in 1842, another in 1844, another in 1849, another in 1861, another in 1868, and another in 1869, to say nothing of Bills which have been introduced and which have fallen through. In 1863 the Committee was appointed to which my hon. and learned Friend has referred. It made its Report in 1864, and in 1866 a Bill was introduced by the then Attorney General, Sir Roundell Palmer, which fell through, another in 1867 by Sir John Rolt, then Attorney General, which met the same fate, and then one in 1869 by Sir Robert Collier, which was passed; and during the present Parliament we have had in each of the last three years a Bankruptcy Bill introduced either in this or the other House. Now, Sir, after all these attempts at legislation, after all these futile efforts to accomplish what is, or should be, the great and simple object of a Bankruptcy Law, to collect and fairly distribute the assets of an insolvent debtor among his creditors, after all these failures — these egregious failures — of law upon law, one attempt after another to legislate, I venture to put it to the House whether we are not approaching, if we have not yet approached, the time when it will become, if it be not now, our duty to re-consider this whole system of bankruptcy legislation, and to say whether, in the interests of the commercial community, and of commercial morality, it will not be better to put an end to this special legislation altogether? Sir, this idea is not a novel one. I claim no originality for it; I have heard it discussed for many years past. I believe it is gaining ground. I believe it is the opinion of many commercial Gentlemen occupying seats in this House, and whose opinions I hope to hear presently in support of my own. It is an opinion, also, which has been pronounced by high judicial authority, both in this country and in the great commercial community on the other side of the Atlantic—I mean the United States of America. If the House will allow me, I will give them a quotation or two, to justify me, since my hon. and learned Friend has spoken of my views on the subject, as of something quite unheard of, and utterly untenable. Of course, I cannot expect to convince the House to-day, and I do not mean to divide on the question whether we should abolish the Bankruptcy Laws or not. If that had been my intention, I should have placed on the Paper the proper Notice for that purpose; but when we are called upon to consider a new Bankruptcy Law, and to enact a consolidating Statute, it is a fitting occasion, I submit, for calling attention to the subject, and I shall justify myself by the authorities from which I will now proceed to quote. Sir, so far back as Lord Eldon's time, speaking of the Bankruptcy Laws, and what seemed to be their inevitable abuse, Lord Eldon said—

“The abuse of the Bankruptcy Law was a disgrace to the community, and it would be better at once to repeal all the Statutes than to suffer them to be applied to such purposes. There was no mercy to the estate. Nothing was less thought of than the object of the Commission. As they were frequently conducted in the country, they were little more than stock-in-trade for the Commissioners, the assignees, and the solicitor.”

That was said at a time when the administration was wholly in the hands of the creditors. Sir, the same complaint is made to-day; that complaint still exists, and, as I believe, always will exist, legislate how we might. Judging from the past, we shall not be able to produce a system which will be free from Lord Eldon's strictures; and I want to know how long these attempts at legislation are to be repeated, and when we are to achieve success in bankruptcy legislation? But, Sir, in the State of New York, the question of bankruptcy was referred to the Judges. In the Report of the Chancellor and Judges of the Supreme Court of New York to the Legislature of that State, on January 2, 1819, they said—

“Judging from their former experience, and from observation in the course of their judicial duties, they were of opinion that an insolvent law was the source of a great deal of fraud and perjury. They were apprehensive that the evil was incurable, and arose principally from the infirmity inherent in every such system. A permanent Insolvent Act made expressly for the relief of the debtor, and held up daily to his view and temptation, had a powerful tendency to render him heedless in the creation of debt and careless as to payment. It induced him to place his hopes of relief rather in contrivances for his discharge, than in increased and severe exertion to perform his duty. It held out an easy, tempting mode of procuring an absolute release to the debtor from his debts, and the system had been, and still was, and probably ever must be, from the very nature of it, productive of incalculable abuse, fraud, and perjury, and generally injurious to the public morals.”

That was the view of experienced men, Judges of the Supreme Court of the commercial State of New York, to the Legislature of that State. But, say my hon. and learned Friend, to abolish Bankruptcy Laws would be to prevent a man from ever being discharged from his debts and from ever beginning again

Mr. Serjeant Simon

Why, does my hon. and learned Friend forget that down to the fifth year of the reign of Queen Anne a bankrupt was never discharged from his debts? The Statute of Anne introduced, for the first time, certificates of discharge, and then only with the consent of the creditors. It was not until the 5th and 6th of the present reign that the power of granting the certificate was taken out of the hands of the creditors and transferred to the Court. Down to this time, the bankrupt's future property remained liable for his debts, unless he received his discharge—that is, his certificate of conformity, from his creditors. My hon. and learned Friend thinks this is something cruel and very hard. Why, it was the law of England down to 1861, in the case of insolvent non-traders, whose future property, notwithstanding their discharge from prison, was, with certain slight exceptions, liable until their debts were paid in full; that is also the state of the law almost throughout the European States, in Germany, in France, in Holland, and in Belgium. A bankrupt's future property remains liable to the claims of his creditors. In Germany, in some of the States—I may mention particularly the State of Westphalia—a bankrupt is not allowed to begin business again until he has discharged all his obligations to his creditors. Again, I will go to the United States of America, and I cannot take a better example, because they are our own kith and kin, and they are a commercial people like ourselves. What is the law in the United States? In the first place, there is no general Law of Bankruptcy there. In 1800, Congress passed a law establishing a uniform system of Bankruptcy throughout the States. The Act was limited to five years, and thence to the end of the next Session; but it was repealed within the period by an Act of Congress of 9th December, 1803. In 1860, an effort was made to re-establish a uniform system; but Congress, upon Constitutional grounds, refused to pass it, as it involved the right of discharging the debtor from his contracts. At length, in 1861, an Act was passed; but on the 3rd March, 1863, it was repealed; and now each State has its own Insolvent Law. Now, what are the provisions of these laws as regards the discharge of the bankrupt from his debts, about which my hon. and learned Friend is so solicitous; in

New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Tennessee, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Illinois, Insolvent Laws extend to debtors in prison on mesne or final process only, but they do not touch his debts; in Missouri, New Hampshire, Virginia, and Kentucky, to the relief of debtors charged in execution, not to others. In Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, and Louisiana, it applies to debtors in or out of prison. In New York the debtor is discharged with the assent of two-thirds in value of his creditors on the disclosure and surrender of his property. Connecticut, Ohio, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Illinois, North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, and Missouri, go only to exempting the person of the debtor, and leave his obligations in full force to be discharged out of his future acquisitions. This, I believe, is the limitation of the Insolvent Laws in a vast number of the States. Maryland by an Act of 1774, subjected to the former debts of an insolvent his future acquisition by descent, gift, service, bequest, or in a course of distribution. Therefore, Sir, it is nothing new for an insolvent debtor to remain liable for his debts, even if he go through the process of bankruptcy, or, as in the United States, or, until 1861, in this country, the Insolvent Court. I refer to these cases as an answer to my hon. and learned Friend, who seemed to recoil from the notion that if there were no Bankruptcy Law the consequences would be that a bankrupt would never be released from his debts. In Europe, and in the United States of America, as I have shown, the property of an insolvent debtor remains liable to his creditors. It was the case in this country down to 1861 as to non-traders; and it was the case down to the 5 & 6 Vict., subject to the will of the creditors, in the case of bankrupt traders. Therefore, the idea is not new. We have made an alteration in this respect; but in the Act of 1869 it was provided that in case of a debtor applying to be discharged from his debts, he should pay 10s. in the pound, and now it is proposed by the present Bill to relax that provision by reducing the amount; but I will deal with that subject hereafter, when the Bill goes into Committee.

Bankruptcy Laws in this country, I affirm, have proved beneficial to no one except to the debtor, the assignees, or trustees, the officials of the Court, and lawyers. Tell me an instance in which a creditor has been benefited by the Bankruptcy Law? Why, Sir, complaint has been loud and continuous that the debtor, not to mention trustees and legal advisers, is the person who chiefly gets the benefit of the law, and, generally speaking, not the honest debtor. If there were no Bankruptcy Law, there would be nothing at Common Law to prevent the creditor from making terms with his debtor. There is nothing to prevent all the creditors from relieving their debtor upon such terms as they may think fit. The only reason for a special law is to enable the majority to bind the minority; and upon that point, unless it can be shown that there are high considerations of expediency rendering it necessary, it seems to me to be contrary to justice and sound economy that a majority should prevail, so as to compel a minority to yield up their rights upon a matter of private contract. The whole principle of bankruptcy legislation seems to me to be based on fallacious grounds. What are those grounds? That the uncertainties and vicissitudes of trade are such that an honest man may, through misfortune, become unable to meet his engagements; therefore, the law should step in to do—what? To relieve him from his responsibility to his creditors. Now, as I have said, no special law is necessary to enable creditors to do so, as I believe creditors have been always ready to do in the case of an honest and really unfortunate debtor. But, in the vast majority of cases, you have to deal with dishonest men, or with men whose failure has been the result of their own misconduct, and not of misfortune. The Bankruptcy Laws are an encouragement to such persons. They promote a system of reckless trading and speculation, a readiness amounting to eagerness to give, as well as to take, credit; and, as was pointed out by the Judges in their Report to the Legislature of New York, indifference on the part of debtors in regard to their obligations, and of systematic scheming in order to get rid of them. It is an encouragement to the creditor to give credit loosely, because he has a sort of a vague feeling,

though it is utterly unsubstantial, that he shall, somehow, in case of disaster, be able to get something out of the wreck of his debtor's estate. As to the something, we know how small it is from the Report of the Comptroller General, lately presented to the House. It is an encouragement to the debtor to contract debt recklessly, to speculate with his creditor's means, knowing that the profit will be his and the loss his creditor's. If we had no Bankruptcy Laws, the state of things would be simply this—the creditor would look after his debtor, and would not give him too large or too extended a credit; for, when he found that payment was not forthcoming within a reasonable time, he would have recourse to his ordinary legal remedy for the recovery of his debt; and if his debtor proved fraudulent, he would take means to punish him; or if we had a law, such as they have in some Continental States, under which no bankrupt is allowed to commence business again until he had discharged his obligations, I think we should be far better off than we shall be by any enactment such as the one now proposed. Now, with regard to the present Bill, when my hon. and learned Friend was introducing it, he paid a tribute to the Bill of Sir Robert Collier, and one might have thought that my hon. and learned Friend was introducing a mere Amending Bill to cure certain defects in the present law. Instead of that, we have a Consolidation Bill, proposing important changes. When the present Bankruptcy Act was introduced, it was received with high-sounding praises on both sides of the House, and those praises came chiefly, if not exclusively, from the commercial Members. One hon. Gentleman after another got up and offered his meed of praise and congratulations to Sir Robert Collier. But, before two years were over, defects were discovered, and the Act was denounced by the very persons and the class who had been loud in their praises. That Act of 1869 was based upon the evidence of merchants, taken before the Committee of 1863, and, I believe, upon the suggestions of the Associated Chambers of Commerce. It might be said to be the offspring of the Associated Chambers. It was received, as I have said, with high-sounding praises and with congratulations from the commercial Gentlemen in this House, and by the commercial community without. But, before two years were over, complaints were loud against it, and dissatisfaction has gone on gaining ground year by year, until, three years ago, the present Government brought in their first Bill. The hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Sampson Lloyd), the President of the Associated Chambers, has himself introduced a Bill, which, I must do him the justice to say, I infinitely prefer to the Bill of the Government. When we see what has been the course of procedure from time to time, when we see the Bill of 1869, introduced with the approval of the commercial classes, prepared, it may be said, under their auspices, yet that it has proved, according to them, an utter failure, I want to know with what hope we can look upon the present Bill? I must say I have none whatever. If this Bill passes, either in its present form, or amended, it will meet with the fate of all previous legislation on the subject. In the course of two or three years, its defects and its faults will be disclosed, and it will be as strongly condemned as the Bill of 1869; and I believe that the time will then have arrived for considering the whole question of the expediency of further legislation, and we shall have before us a Bill to repeal all Bankruptcy Laws, and to put an end to this exceptional legislation. In all legislative attempts hitherto, the object has been to do something to protect the rights of the creditor; but my hon. and learned Friend has taken new ground to-day; he takes upon himself a burden, which, it seems to me, perfectly dreadful for any man to assume—namely, to endeavour by this Bill to “force”—that was his expression—to “force” creditors to look after their interests. Why has the Act of 1869 failed? Because, as my hon. and learned Friend tells us, and as everyone else tells us—because of the indifference of creditors. I do not blame them. I do not reproach them. We know perfectly well, when men in business hear of the failure of a debtor, what the result is. They attend a meeting of creditors; they hear a statement of his affairs, and they come away; they have too much to do to look after a bad debt, and they leave the affair to trustees and accountants. It is because of this negligence of their interests by creditors that the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 has, in a great measure, been a failure. If the mercantile community would agree to spend their time in looking after bad debts, this Act would not have been a failure; but it is not to be expected that men fully laden with business engagements, and with many pressing duties, would spend their time in looking after bad debts. As my hon. and learned Friend has said, they look at their ledger and wipe it off. How, then, is it possible to coerce them, as my hon. and learned Friend proposes to do? This Bill should have been entitled, instead of a “Bankruptcy Bill,” a “Bill to compel Mercantile Men to look after their Interests.” I believe that no legislation can be brought to bear on men who must, in the nature of the case, leave affairs in bankruptcy in the hands of others, and who are more or less indifferent. We have laws to protect infants under age. We have laws for the protection of persons of unsound mind, incapable of managing their own affairs; but this is the first time the British Parliament has been called upon to pass a law to protect and to compel persons who are capable, perhaps the most capable of any in the community, to look after their own interests. Yet this is what my hon. and learned Friend says it is proposed to do by his Bill. With regard to the alterations in the law which it contains, as to some of them, I am sorry I cannot congratulate my hon. and learned Friend, as his Predecessor was congratulated when he introduced the Bill of 1869. From my hon. and learned Friend's opening remarks upon the present Act, it seems to me that all that was required was the introduction of a few clauses in the shape of an Amending Bill; but it has been thought right to introduce a Consolidating Bill. If it had been an attempt to find remedies for the defect of the existing Act; even if, in some instances, the attempt had failed, I would not have found fault; but the Government have gone out of their way to make alterations upon points about which we have never had complaints. My hon. and learned Friend tells us of complaints arising under the system of liquidation, of the conduct of trustees, and the manner in which estates are made away with; and he says we must find a remedy for these evils. Granted. But whoever complained of the process for adjudicating a debtor a bankrupt? Have the mercantile classes complained? Have the debtors complained? I have never heard a single complaint on the subject. Nothing but the theoretical statement and suggestions of certain persons which have been quoted to-day have we heard; and, acting upon those suggestions, Her Majesty's Government have contrived a scheme by which, if they had wished to play into the hands of the dishonest debtor, they could not have succeeded better. When a man is insolvent, when he is unable to meet his engagements, and commits an act of bankruptcy, common sense demands that, in the interest of the creditors, no time should be lost; that the sooner the adjudication is made the better; and that at this stage the creditor is the only person who should be thought of. What is the present process under the Act of 1869? As soon as a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy you serve a notice on him, and apply to the Court, and upon proving the debt and act of bankruptcy, as prescribed by the law, he is at once adjudicated a bankrupt. If he has not committed an act of bankruptcy, or if he can show reason why he should not be adjudicated, he has the opportunity of stating his case, and of preventing, or annulling, the adjudication. What is the injury to him in being called upon to do that? But, contrast this proceeding with the one proposed by the Bill. Before you can make a man a bankrupt, you are to give him such notice that if he be so minded, he has the opportunity to make away with all his property, to flee the country, and to put his creditors to all kinds of trouble of delay, and expense. He is first to have notice that you are going to take proceedings, and what then? There is to be a provisional order; the creditors are then to meet, and the majority present are to determine whether or not the debtor shall be made a bankrupt, the debtor having also the opportunity of showing why he should not. It may be more logical, as my hon. and learned Friend says, to commence in this way; but, for the practical purposes of legislation, it will defeat the object in view, which should be expedition for the protection of creditors against, in the majority of cases, the fraudulent debtor. My hon. and learned Friend says the Bill has only met with objection from creditors, trustees, and fifth-rate solicitors. Now, I do not know whether he has seen a printed paper drawn up by a gentleman who certainly cannot be designated a fifth-rate solicitor, and who has pointed out how, under this new system proposed, a man could, if dishonestly inclined, and under certain circumstances, with a skilful solicitor by his side, have the proceedings protracted and the adjudication postponed for several weeks, with no fewer than 14 meetings and adjournments in the meantime, all attended with expense to the creditors. My hon. and learned Friend says this will be under very exceptional, very remote, circumstances; but I take issue with him. In cases of bankruptcy you have constantly to deal with tricky, designing men, not honest and unfortunate persons, anxious to do the best for their creditors. There is a semi-official document I have read somewhere that says that out of 1,000 bankruptcies, only one is brought about honestly; I will not put it so severely as that; but, unquestionably, the great majority of bankrupts are men who do not fall within the category of honest or unfortunate men. In such cases, then, it is most desirable to have the proceedings conducted expeditiously; but under this Bill, with the new process proposed, I have no hesitation in saying that a dishonest man in the hands of a clever solicitor, ready to avail himself of all the technicalities and of the opportunities which will be afforded by this Bill, will be able to carry on proceedings for weeks together, before the adjudication can take place. At every step you have meetings involving applications to the Court; no time is prescribed, all is left to arrangement at the will of the debtor and his advisers. And what is the position of the absent creditors, for whom my hon. and learned Friend is so solicitous? Why, the majority present are to determine whether the estate shall be administered in bankruptcy or not? That being the case, it seems that the change in the process for adjudication is the most extraordinary ever heard of. The change is in a matter, too, about which there have been no complaints, but which has worked well, involving no unfairness to the debtor or the absent creditor, a change which alters what is of the first importance.

as a means to the end—namely, expedition and promptitude, where loss of time must be disastrous. This is one of the great, the cardinal changes, to be effected by the Bill; a change that can and will operate only in aid of the fraudulent debtor. I confess, when the Bill goes into Committee, I shall feel it my duty to propose to strike out all these new clauses, and leave the law as it is; so that, when a debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy, the creditor shall be able to go before the Court and procure an immediate adjudication, leaving the debtor, on whom the onus ought to lie, to set aside the adjudication, if it has been improperly made. Then, my hon. and learned Friend says, with regard to trustees, that the Bill will abolish liquidation. Now, I agree with him that the system of liquidation has worked badly, and is fraught with mischief. But that is the fault of the creditors in most cases, and, to some extent, of the present law. If my hon. and learned Friend had succeeded in removing the evils from the liquidation system I would congratulate him, for he would have rendered a great service to the commercial community; but under the Bill, in place of liquidation, we are to go back to deeds. I must say that I have been astonished at this proposal. Deeds have been prolific of litigation in the past, and no one knows this better than my hon. and learned Friend; yet deeds are to take the place of liquidation. We know from experience of former days how they gave rise to every kind of difficulty, and to technical objections without end, and yet we are to return to them. Does my hon. and learned Friend think that deeds will succeed better now than in the past? But what are the provisions about these deeds? If hon. Members would consider them, they would find that they are to enable an insolvent debtor, without consulting his creditors, but behind their backs, to frame a deed and put it before them for signature. A man is to be allowed to concoct a deed offering a certain minimum amount in the pound, prescribed by the Bill, and all he will have to do will be to get a plausible solicitor, or accountant, or a friend or relative, or a friendly creditor, to say to the creditors—"You had better sign this. Here is a certain composition. You had much better not let the estate go into Bankruptcy; if you do, you will get nothing." Thus, men will be drawn into giving their signatures. I should have thought, if liquidation was to cease and deeds be substituted, in common justice to the creditors they should have the opportunity of deciding whether they would accept a deed, what its terms should be, and what the amount of the composition. But, no; the terms are to be settled by the debtor himself, and the deed prepared beforehand, without notice to the creditors, and then they are to be told, or asked, to sign it. The whole thing is to be concocted and arranged in private, behind the back of the creditors. This is the remedy proposed in place of liquidation. All the debtor will have to do, under the deed clauses, will be to get a solicitor to draw up a deed on any terms he might choose to offer, and take the deed round to the creditors, and get it signed, without any opportunity beforehand for inquiring into the affairs of the bankrupt. If you cannot get creditors now, when meetings are required by law, to look after their own interests, I think I am not putting it too strongly, when I say that creditors will not look after them under the provisions of the Bill in the case of deeds. But the creditors are not to be required to sign the deed itself. They may sign a document, stating that they agree to the tenour or purport of the deed, and that document or form may be framed in a way so as altogether to delude the creditors, and to give them a vague or incorrect idea of the deed. The deed, moreover, is not necessarily to transfer the whole estate, but only a part; and, when signed, the Court is to confirm it. That is, it may be confirmed by the Registrar of the Court, possibly, a practising solicitor, or connected with the solicitor who has prepared the deed, or with the debtor or his friends. This is the remedy of the Government for curing the evils of liquidation. Another point I must refer to. It is one of much importance to commercial classes. By the Bill, a debtor may make himself a bankrupt upon his own petition. We have tried this before. We tried it in the Bill of 1849. It sounds very plausible to say that when a man is in difficulties, and has declared that he cannot pay 20s. in the pound, he should be allowed to petition the Court, and to say—"I will give up all I have to meet the demands of my creditors." If there were none but honest debtors, it would be fair enough to have such an arrangement; but we have had experience in this matter, and that experience tells us of the class of men who go through the Bankruptcy Court. Three-fifths, at least, are not honest or unfortunate; but men who incur debts recklessly, and make away with the property of their creditors. When you are dealing with a class of men of this description, to enable them to say when it suits their convenience, when they have made away with their creditors' property, and secured some of the spoil, to give such persons facilities for obtaining release from their obligations, does appear to me a strange proposition. It will be a sure means of encouraging fraudulent bankruptcies. To show the practical result of this system while it was in operation, I will just refer to some statistics quoted by Lord Hatherley in "another place" in 1877. Speaking of the result of the Act of 1861, by which debtors were enabled to become bankrupts upon their own petitions, it appeared that, during the year ending October, 1869, out of 10,000 adjudicated bankrupts, 7,530 were adjudicated bankrupt on their own petition; and the results, as regards creditors, in the same year, was this—1,695 paid dividends, and 7,346 paid no dividends. The House, then, sees what class of traders it was that availed themselves of the Bankruptcy Court, upon their own petitions, and with what results to the creditors. But we know also, when that state of the law existed, that it put into the mouth of the debtor a continued threat against the creditors. It was a common thing for him to go round to his creditors and say—"I cannot pay 20s. in the pound; I will give you a composition, if you like to take it; if you do not, I will go through the Court." This threat was held over creditors; and, in fact, it was common in the mouths of debtors. And yet this Bill would restore this power to the debtor. I did not mean to detain the House at the length I have done. Personally, the Bankruptcy Law is a matter of no interest to me. I am not a commercial man. Whether the law be good or bad, it is no affair of mine personally speaking; but, as a Member of this House and of a Profession which has for years continually brought the subject to my attention, and representing an important commercial constituency, as I have the honour to do, I have felt it my duty to go into the subject. I have now wish to throw out the Bill. My object has been to bring to the attention of the House the whole course of our bankruptcy legislation, believing, as I do, that we shall have hereafter, and at no very distant time, to consider the question of the expediency of that special legislation known as Bankruptcy Law, with a view to its entire abolition. It is my desire, however, to assist in making the present Bill a useful measure, either before a Select Committee, or by Amendments, which I am ready to propose in Committee of the Whole House. If it were a question whether this Bill should pass or not in its present form, without amendment, I would, unhesitatingly, divide the House; but that is not my wish. My object is to assist my hon. and learned Friend, if he will allow me to do so, by such Amendments as I shall feel it my duty to propose in Committee, in order that we may pass a measure which will be efficient for the protection of those great interests upon which the prosperity of the country largely depend.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in rising to second the Amendment, said, that in the course of his professional life he had learned and unlearned no less than three systems of Bankruptcy Law; and he, therefore, must be pardoned if he naturally looked with suspicion upon any proposal to alter the law for a fourth time. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General that the history of our bankruptcy legislation was a dismal record of melancholy failures. There must, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) maintained, be something radically wrong about a system which required to be pulled to pieces once in every six years or so. The hon. and learned Attorney General had attributed the failure of the Act of 1869 mainly to the apathy of creditors in reference to bad debts; but there were other causes to which that failure was due. When the Bill was passed, with an air of triumph through the House, it was said that there had been enough of lawyers' legislation, and that what was wanted was merchants' legislation. The people, it was said, who were most interested in the recovery of the bankrupt's estate were, of course, the creditors. But what fruit had the Act borne? In his Report, the Controller in Bankruptcy said, last year—

“The actual loss by bad debts in cases under the Bankruptcy Act will be about £25,000,000 for the year 1878—a somewhat heavy tax on consumers, as it does not include the losses from Scotch and Irish insolvency, joint-stock companies, deceased insolvents, private arrangements, or the many thousands of small insolvencies which are not dealt with under the present Bankruptcy Law.”

This sum of £25,000,000, he had no hesitation in saying, was a tax levied upon honest men for the benefit of rogues. Before the House proceeded to further legislation, they ought to inquire to what causes was the failure of the Act to be attributed. One, as had been already observed, was the indifference and apathy of creditors about their bad debts. His hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney General) said the Bill before the House would make creditors take care of their own interests; but he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) doubted very much whether this result could really be brought about by any Act of Parliament. Another cause of the failure of the Act of 1869 was the existence of the new class of trustees whom the Act had created—a class whose profession it became to prey, like vultures upon carcases, upon the estates of insolvent persons, and to get as much as they possibly could out of them. He acknowledged that a clause in the Bill which compelled a trustee to account once in some stated period would have a valuable effect, and to that extent he fully agreed with the Bill. The chief cause of the failure of the Act of 1869 was, however, the extreme leniency of the law to debtors. The law was, in fact, administered in the interest of the debtor, and not in the interest of the creditor, and seemed designed for enabling rogues to prey upon honest men. When he contemplated the facilities which the law, and particularly the Bankruptcy Law, gave for the perpetration of fraud, he wondered that they did not all turn rogues. He was of opinion, in fact, that in this country honesty was not the best policy. Men embarked in reckless enterprizes, or hopeless actions, and if failure resulted they got themselves whitewashed, threw off their liabilities, as they would an old coat, and there the matter ended. The question, therefore, was, would these men be reached by the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend? Some of the clauses in that Bill he could not but approve. He quite agreed that the law should be administered by a Judge who had time to attend to his business. The present Chief Judge (Vice Chancellor Bacon) had only a remnant of his time to devote to bankruptcy matters, and was, therefore, compelled to delegate a large portion of his duties to the Registrars. He was also glad to see that his hon. and learned Friend proposed to do away with proceedings by liquidation. He was, however, afraid that by introducing deeds of arrangement the Bill would really be opening a still greater door to fraud than that provided by liquidation proceedings. Nothing would be easier than to find a solicitor to go round to creditors and get them to agree to a deed which, in some cases, they might not even see. Until some mode should be found of doing away with the process of manufacturing debts, no real step could ever be made towards the prevention of fraud in cases of bankruptcy. He should, to a certain extent, approve the disappearance of proxies; but it must not be forgotten that if proxies were done away with there would practically be little protection left for absent creditors. His great objection to the system of deeds by arrangement was, that they were tolerated by the Act of 1861, and that the system turned out so badly that in 1869, by the universal consent of the House, it was abolished. He objected in the same manner to the 9th clause of the Bill—the clause enabling a man to be made a bankrupt upon his own petition. While, therefore, approving of some clauses of the Bill, he did not believe that it was calculated to meet the evils complained of, and thought that if the Government had no better proposal to submit for the consideration of the House, it would be better to adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), and get rid of the Bankruptcy Law altogether. The Law of Bankruptcy was justified on two grounds, the first of which consisted of an affirmation that it was necessary in order to secure equal distribution among creditors. The second ground upon which the policy of the existing Bankruptcy Law had been defended was, that all legislation on the subject must protect debtors in so far as they were entitled to protection. He admitted the justice of that view; because, as was well known, the tendency of bankruptcy legislation in former times was to deal with debtors in much too lenient a point of view. He could not conceive that there was any practical injustice in leaving a man who had become bankrupt to fight out his case with his creditors, instead of making it a fixed rule of law that certain proceedings should be taken in every case. What was necessary to be done in order to protect honest traders who were driven into bankruptcy was to pass such a law as would put an end to the reckless trading which was at present carried on by men in defiance of a law so loosely made as that it did not, and could not, touch them. Independent of the general question, and of the merits of the Bill itself, he objected to the fact that a measure of this kind, introduced in "another place," and dealing with an important commercial question, had been brought down to the House of Commons—a great number of whose Members were commercial men—at so late a period of the Session, when it would not be possible to discuss it fully; containing, as it did, 159 clauses, which, if the second reading were agreed to, would have to be considered in Committee in the beginning of August, when legal Members of the House would either be out of town or too jaded to pay proper attention to the subject. As that would be a very undesirable state of affairs, he seconded the Amendment. A Bill of the kind could not, if passed, receive the approval of the commercial world, the Legal Profession, or the general public. If, however, it was to be pressed, he trusted that ample opportunity would be given for the discussion of its details in Committee.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months." — (Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD said, that notwithstanding the conciliatory speech of the hon. and learned Attorney General, he could not but agree in the view of the hon. and learned Member who had just addressed the House (Mr. Osborne Morgan), that a Bill so important as the one before the House ought not to be presented to the House of Commons so late in the Session. He must also be allowed to express his regret that the Government had not seen fit to introduce the Bill in the first instance to the House of Commons, where practical knowledge of the subject was so much greater than it was in the House of Lords. The Commission which had reported upon it comprised many very eminent names, but purely those of professional men; but if a few of another class had been on it, its recommendations might not have commanded less confidence. As to the Bill itself, if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was right in saying that it followed the principles of the Act of 1869—and he (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) was glad to hear him say so—he thought the better way of dealing with the subject would have been to bring in a short amending Bill to remove the blots from that measure, instead of embarking upon sweeping legislation of this kind, and disturbing the enormous mass of decisions which had been arrived at on the interpretations of the provisions of the existing Act, thereby confusing the mercantile world. It was preposterous to proceed with a Bill of 159 clauses at that period of the Session. He should also have been glad if it had been stated further that bankruptcy legislation for England in the future was to follow the lines of the Act passed for Scotland in 1856—an Act which secured speed and economy in the winding up of bankrupt estates. What he feared was, that if the Bill were to pass as it stood at present it would lead to considerably increased expense in administration, besides causing unnecessary litigation in establishing the principles of the law upon this new basis. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Attorney General in thinking that the Bill was opposed by professional trustees and accountants, and he shared the objection which the hon. and learned Gentleman had to such form of opposition; but he also knew that it was strongly objected to by a large section of the commercial class, which had a right to be heard on a question of that kind. The question, after all, came to be, what they were to do with the Bill at the period of the Session at which they had arrived? He did not think that the Bill should be rejected altogether. It might be amended, so as to evolve order out of the present chaos; and if the Government would only send it to a Select Committee to have it thoroughly examined, with a view to the evolution of wise and beneficial legislation, he should be inclined to support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. NORWOOD could not join in the wholesale denunciation of the Act of 1869, the failure of which was mainly due to the fact that too much power was placed in the hands of trustees. He was of opinion that the Act did not deserve all the blame and the abuse that had been heaped upon it. In many cases the Act worked well enough. It was based upon the rule that creditors should alone decide as to the way in which the assets of bankrupts should be realized and distributed, either by liquidation, bankruptcy, or arrangement. He saw no reason why there should be any interference with that principle, unless it could be shown that a bankrupt had been guilty of fraud, or some other offence against the law as it affected bankrupts. The real fault of the Act, as he had said, was that it gave too much power to the trustees, whereas the Bill now submitted was too much overlaid with officialism. If they were to have a new Bankruptcy Act, it ought to be as simple as possible. He would admit that the Bill afforded a basis for improving the law; but while saying that he could not help feeling that there was great force in the observations which had been made as to the late period of the Session at which the Bill had been brought down to the House from "another place" in which it had been introduced. He thought they could do as well without a Bankruptcy Law as with one providing that insolvent debtors were prevented from giving preference to particular creditors. He did not consider there would be sufficient time to pass the Bill that Session, seeing that, in all probability, it would lead to a great deal of contention, in addition to which it bristled with too many difficulties. The Reports of the Controller in Bankruptcy had frequently been referred to; but, with all respect to that gentleman, he took an extreme view of the magnitude of his office. It was a great pity the Government had adopted the form of a Code. They would be all thankful to have a Code like the Merchant Shipping; but he would remind the House that the present Act was a Code. The expense inflicted on the mercantile community was very great. For the first two years after the passing of the Act there was constant litigation as to the interpretation to be placed on words; and here, in this Bill, the Government was about to express the same thing in different language. The commercial community felt so strongly as to the necessity of having an amending Act that they had gone to the trouble of drafting an amending Act. He had the Bill in his hands. It was a short measure, and they believed it would rectify all the evils under the present law. He thought that frequent applications to the Court would be fraught with delay and a cloak for fraud. On one point he desired to be most emphatic. If they were to have a Bankruptcy Bill at all, the existing Act ought to form the basis of a simple and good Bankruptcy Law; and if, under the Judicature Act, they were to have a new Judge appointed, he hoped he would be a strong one, a good commercial lawyer, who could take up a question with commercial knowledge, and let him devote his time entirely to his duties as Bankruptcy Judge, and not be a kind of Jack-of-all-trades on the Bench, having his time frittered away by being sent on Circuit. If such a person were appointed, that would, in itself, be a great improvement, and an important step would be taken. Take it altogether, he did not regard the present law as a bad law; but he thought they would have a worse Bill if they adopted the proposal of the Government. He thought it was too late in the Session to enter into the question in a proper and calm spirit, and he thought it would be wise on the part of the Government to withdraw the Bill.

MR. GREGORY supported the Bill on the ground that a change was most desirable, and because he thought the measure went in the right direction. In his opinion, the Government, in framing the Bill, might have gone a little further; for the Bankruptcy Court, as it now existed, ought to be done away with altogether, and the business of Bankruptcy spread over the Courts of the country. The present system of liquidation by arrangement had led to a good deal of touting for proxies; and the fact was that the result of the meeting of creditors was, generally, a foregone conclusion. He, therefore, cordially agreed in that which was considered one of the main features of the Bill—the substitution of deeds of arrangement for the strange system—if it could be called a system—which they had of liquidation by arrangement. Another matter of some importance was the question of shortening the period for the recovery of debts in Bankruptcy. At present, anyone who chose to sleep on his rights for six years could come in and prove his debts. He did not think it was right. He would venture to propose that that period should be shortened to four years at least. He thought the general principle of a period of six years for the recovery of debts was too long. With one or two exceptions, as to which he should move Amendments, however, he would give his support to the Bill. As to the question of the introduction of the Bill at that late period of the Session, a suggestion had been made that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. He thought that would be a very desirable course, if they could depend on the deliberations of the Select Committee being acceptable to the House when the Bill was returned to it. If the House was content to accept the Bill and take it as it came out of the Committee, he did not know that any better course could be taken. If hon. Members would put their Amendments on the Paper between now and the Motion to go into Committee, the House would then know what Amendments were to be proposed. He thought, in that way, that some arrangement might be made which would materially facilitate the passing of the Bill into law.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA also thought the Bill was a considerable step in the right direction. No doubt, it required a certain amount of revision; but that could be done by a Committee of the Whole House, and without the ordeal of a Select Committee. He hoped the Bill would be read a second time; he believed it had been already carefully revised in "another place" and could be well dealt with this Session; and, notwithstanding differences of opinion at present, he thought it would be possible without much delay to get the House to agree to a settlement of the points now in dispute.

MR. ANDERSON said, that he was in Parliament when the present Bankruptcy Act was passed, and he very well remembered taking a considerable part in it; because one of the main objects of Sir Robert Collier, in promoting the Act, was to adopt, to a large extent, the system which then existed in Scotland. He (Mr. Anderson) believed that through his knowledge of the Scotch law he was of some assistance to Sir Robert Collier in carrying out that object, and that the Act then passed was, as far as it went, a very good Act. In some respects it was quite an improvement on the Scotch system, and in other points it adopted the Scotch system; but where it failed and broke down was in management, because they had not been able to import Scotch economy, Scotch management, and Scotch lawyers' charges along with the Scotch system. It was in the matter of cost principally that the thing had broken down in England. In Scotland, very often, it was one of the creditors who was trustee, and the estate was therefore managed economically, and with the interest of the creditors at heart. On the other hand, a bankrupt estate in England was always handed over to professional accountants; and when the new Act was passed the whole thing was simply handed over to the same lot of solicitors and accountants who had practical charge of affairs under the old Act. It was not likely that these men would forego any of their charges, or that they would in any way try to make the new system more economical than the old one was. That was how the new Act had broken down; and in this Bill he saw no trace of any intention to improve that state of affairs. They were still to have a scale of charges arranged by lawyers, for the benefit of lawyers, in which the interest of the public was wholly ignored. He had no hesitation in saying that the charges in the Bankruptcy Court all through, both the lawyers' charges and the accountants' charges, were neither more nor less than an infamous legalized robbery of everybody, and nothing better. Until the House could adopt some system of reducing these charges and fees, and putting it in the power of somebody else than mere lawyers to say what fees were to be, they would not make the system one whit better than it was at present. He was glad to see so many Professional Gentlemen were present to hear what he had to say upon that matter; and he would repeat that the charges were infamously high, and unless they were brought down to something like the level of the Scotch charges there would be no benefit from the Bill. Even with these excessive charges, people who paid them did not get justice. Look, for instance, at the London Bankruptcy Court. The system there had been reduced to one of Registrars. Most of the work was done by those gentlemen, who were a notoriously weak lot of Judges, of no professional standing, and unable to give satisfactory judgments; and if a case was appealed, it went, at least in theory, from a Registrar to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. Unfortunately, however, in practice the Chief Judge did not really hear the appeal, which came again before one of these weak Registrars, who simply changed his title for the occasion, and sat as Chief Judge to hear an appeal from a brother Registrar no weaker than himself. That, he thought, was a very improper system; and although the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had suggested various Amendments, he did not think that the Bill could be sufficiently amended to make it satisfactory in that particular. He (Mr. Anderson) did not wish to discuss the details of the measure, or to go largely into the subject with which it dealt; but he did not believe it possible, at that late period of the Session, to make the Bill a satisfactory one. There was a great deal to amend, which would involve an immense amount of discussion. Take, for instance, the Schedule describing a trader. It was copied from the last Act, and was about the lamest and most wretched definition of a trader that ever was heard of. Look at the trades which were put in, and the trades which were left out. Brickmakers, builders, carpenters, and lime-burners were amongst those put in. Those were four trades connected with building; but if four trades connected with building ought to be put in, why not all trades connected with building? Before there could be any lime to burn, it must be taken from a quarry, and yet quarry-owners were not included in the Schedule. Neither were plasterers, plumbers, slaters, nor glaziers, all of whom were connected with building. That was an absurd anomaly. There was another. Cow-keepers and market gardeners were specially mentioned as traders; but farmers and graziers were as expressly excluded. If the cowkeepers were put in, why should the graziers be left out; or if the market gardener was to be put in, why should the farmer be left out? Then, when he came to the manufacturers, he found the Bill just as lame. The only kind of manufacturer who was included in the description of traders was the maker of alum. He would like to ask what there was of a special character in the making of alum to constitute the persons engaged in that business traders more than any other manufacturers? All other manufacturers could only come into the Bill under the vague term of—

MR. SPEAKER, interposing, said, he was bound to point out that the House was now discussing the second reading of the Bill, and the hon. Member's remarks referred to rather minute details, which might be reserved for Committee.

MR. ANDERSON replied, that he thought he was only following the practice which had been indulged in by previous speakers of showing the reasons why he thought it impossible for the House to deal with the Bill at this late period. There were many matters of minute detail which had not been attended to in the Bill. The measure was intended to amend the existing Act; but it ought to amend it thoroughly, if they were now to deal with it at all; and he was simply endeavouring to show by illustration that the Bill did not attempt to amend some of the absurd anomalies in the old law, and that, at that late period of the Session, he did not see how it was possible to make it do so. He would, however, refrain, according to the ruling of Mr. Speaker, from saying anything more about details. The hon. Member for East Sussex suggested that the Bill might with advantage be referred to a Select Committee; but, in his (Mr. Anderson's) opinion, the lateness of the Session was also a bar to dealing with a measure of such magnitude in that manner. If that course were taken, there would be no prospect of having the Bill thoroughly and fairly discussed; and he recommended, for his own part, the hon. and learned Attorney General to be content with having had that discussion, to withdraw the Bill, and to re-introduce it at the beginning of next Session, when it might be referred to a Select Committee, and when it might be possible to come to a satisfactory solution. But at present it was not possible.

MR. MUNTZ agreed in one respect with the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson)—he could not see any prospect of the Bill being passed this Session in a satisfactory manner. It was, no doubt, much needed and anxiously desired; but, without a longer time than seemed available, there was little chance of its being properly considered. Therefore, he trusted that no attempt would be made to go further with it than to refer it to a Select Committee. If the Government would promise to adopt that course, he thought the second reading might be allowed. He considered that, of late years, the tendency of the law had been to do too much for the debtor and too little for the creditor; too much for the dishonest debtor at the expense of the honest creditor; and it was too much in favour of the rogue instead of the honest debtor. Since the passing of the Bankruptcy Act of 1825, they had been going on from bad to worse. That Act was, in his opinion, the most just they had had yet. Under it a bankrupt could only be set at liberty by consent of two-thirds of the amount, or three-fourths of the number of his creditors. The great want under that Act had been a Registrar or Judge in Bankruptcy. All had now been altered, and dishonest rogues had facilities for cheating their creditors in a scandalous manner. There should be power to stop this, and to force dishonest bankrupts by thorough judicial examination to disgorge their property. There need be no fear for honest debtors. He had never known an honest man who had failed through misfortune who was not treated with leniency, and even with generosity, by his creditors. But the law looked after the rogue. What was necessary was that the proceedings in Bankruptcy should be public. He advocated the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee, which would be best qualified to deal with it, and enable it to be passed during the present Session. Some measure of reform was absolutely necessary, and he earnestly trusted that the Government would accept the course which had been suggested to them.

MR. RATHBONE thought that the continuance of the operation of the Bankruptcy Act as it at present stood would bring serious harm to the commercial prosperity of this country. No measure could injure the interests of this country more than a Bill which gave sanction to the evils which were found to prevail in connection with the administration of the Bankruptcy Law. Unfortunately, men, in the rush and haste of life, took their morality from the law; and the law was apt to become, in men's minds, an assertion of what was moral with regard to their actions in certain cases. A Bill of the character and importance of this measure, therefore, ought to be proceeded with with great care and caution; and, in his opinion, it would be impossible, with the Business which the House had before it, at this period of the Session, to give that attention to it which it deserved. But there was a mode by which they might get, practically, the advantage of all the knowledge and experience of those who felt an interest and had had experience in the matter; and, moreover, to obtain what they required, they might simply carry out the recommendations of the Committee which sat last year upon the question of Public Business. There was also the proposal to send the Bill to a Select Committee. He did not, of course, suggest that a Committee should be established consisting of 7 or 14 Members, because there was no reason why such a Committee should not consist of all the practical men of experience in the House who had had anything to do with the operation and administration of the Bankruptcy Act; and it was perfectly possible for a Select Committee to sit at the same time as the other General Committee of the House, as there would be, in future, a good deal of Business that would not require the attendance of a large number of hon. Members. And if a Committee were so constituted, at the same time as the Committee of the Whole House was sitting, the time of hon. Members would not be wasted. He could not but think that that would be a very good arrangement, because, if necessary, the Bill could afterwards proceed through the Committee of the Whole House. He did not, however, think that it would be necessary or desirable that the Bill should go to the Committee after having been dealt with by the Select Committee. If Amendments were required, after the Bill had been before the Committee upstairs, they would still have an opportunity of making them on Report. He ventured to think that that suggestion was worthy of the consideration of the House, and was practically the only one which it was desirable to adopt.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that there were many circumstances in the law as it now stood which he would be glad to see altered, and as to which no time should be lost in devising some remedy for the serious evils now existing. The principal cause of the present scandals was the facilities which fraudulent debtors had of making compositions and settlements by arrangement. Fraudulent debts were concocted to cheat the real creditors, and the persons who received the assets in many cases never really accounted for them, or, at least, delayed long to do so. It was perfectly notorious that a clever solicitor and a clever accountant could devise a plan which could be so cut-and-dried before the general meeting that a protesting creditor would be altogether powerless. There were two or three ways of dealing with the difficulty. The whole of the law might be re-considered, or the House might determine which of the two principles of bankruptcy administration was the more desirable—that was to say, it might choose between the principle of former Acts and that of the Act of the year 1869. The question was, whether the whole matter should be left in the hands of the Court or of the creditor? for both plans had been tried, and neither of them had worked satisfactorily. Of course, no one liked to lose money, and as the Bankruptcy proceedings were begun only when a disaster was established it was impossible to please everyone. Now, the officers of the Court of Bankruptcy had satisfied the Legal Officers of the Government as to the reality of the scandal arising from the Act of 1869, and the Government had proposed a plan to remedy the most crying of those evils. He (Sir Henry Jackson), however, regretted that they had combined in one Bill the changes they desired to make, as well as the re-enactment of the existing law. However, he believed the Bill of the Government was the best they could bring forward, taking into consideration the existing principle of the law of the administration of Bankruptcy which had received the sanction of Parliament. The remedy they proposed was to increase the fetters put upon the obnoxious practices of liquidation and composition by arrangement, and the Bill would probably prevent a great many of those scandals. Lord Westbury's Act of 1861 had given great facilities for such frauds; and hon. Members might remember that just before the passing of an Act of Amendment in 1868 there was a great rush of debtors anxious to avail themselves of the old law. In the present case, if the Bill became law, he had no doubt that the result would be the same as in 1868. In the same way, the provisions of the Act as to the laxity and delay of trustees in regard to their accounts would, in all probability, have a highly beneficial effect. Had the Bill been confined to these objects of amending the present law, it could easily have been passed. Harm it could not have done, good it might have done; and next Session they could have dealt with the work of consolidation. Instead, however, of doing that, the Government had made the mistake of passing an ambitious Bill through the other House at an early period of the Session, and had not brought it on for consideration in the House of Commons till July 16, although it re-opened the whole question as it was settled by the Act of 1869. The House would have had no difficulty in passing a measure of amendment, the good effect of which would have been seen next Session; and, had it done so, it would have paved the way for more complete legislation. He thought that the Bill ought to be re-committed pro forma, and brought back again without its clauses of consolidation. If that were done, it would not matter by what kind of Committee it was discussed, as it would involve no principle, and could be passed easily. He was very anxious indeed to see something done, and the necessity for something to be done was urgent. Although it was a question of only a few months, let them do something at once, for the amount of bad debts being incurred every year was very serious ; and he would put it to the hon. and learned Attorney General whether he could not now re-cast this Bill, so as to leave until next year all that was merely consolidation, and confine the Bill to those points in which the Government knew they were merely amending the existing law? If the Government would do that, he believed that no one would object to it, and they would have the satisfaction of knowing that during the Session they had done some little practical work, for which the commercial community would be grateful.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not address the House upon the merits of any of the questions raised by the previous speakers, though he felt that it was a subject of the highest importance to the mercantile community that the Law of Bankruptcy should be amended, and it was desirable to deal, if practicable, with it that Session. There seemed to be a very general consensus of opinion in the House that the time had come when it was desirable to legislate in this matter, and that the Bill presented, at all events, a good opening and foundation for a satisfactory measure. The only question, therefore, was, whether they had time and means to work the Bill through in the ordinary way, and produce a measure which would be satisfactory. He owned that, in consequence of the pressure of other Business, it had been found impossible to bring on the Bill earlier. If a Bill of 159 clauses was to be discussed in the usual way in Committee of the Whole House, and with the fullness and freedom that the importance of the different clauses demanded, it was highly improbable that they would be able to get the Bill through in the present Session. That would be a very disappointing result, not only to the House, but to the country; for this was, undoubtedly, a measure which had been for a long time desired in many quarters. Now came the question, whether they could get through the work before them. There was an old proverb, that "Where there is a will there is a way," and as he believed there was seriously a will on the part of the House, they would endeavour to see if there was a way. Two or three suggestions had been made, and the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) had offered one worthy of the consideration of the House—namely, to refer the Bill, not merely to a Select Committee of 15 or 20 Members to go through the measure, which should thereafter go through the ordeal of Committee of the Whole House, but to refer it to some larger Committee, so as to include, as far as possible, all those Members likely to take a leading part in the discussion, and to allow that Committee to deal freely with it, and put it into such a shape as they thought likely to commend it to the House; and if the result of the labours of that Committee should justify such a step, but not otherwise, it would be perfectly possible, and quite within the Rules of the House, that a Motion should be made when the Bill came down from that Committee to negative the ordinary stage of the Committee of the Whole House, and to order that the Bill, amended by the Committee, should be taken into consideration on a day named. If so taken into consideration, it would be open to Members who desired to do so to move Amendments upon the Report. It would be competent, on the other hand, if the result of the labours of the Committee were not satisfactory, and hon. Members thought it desirable that the Bill should go through Committee of the Whole House, to negative the proposal to report it without that stage. But if the Committee were well chosen, and attended by Gentlemen qualified to take part in the discussion, they would be rendering a very great service to the country and the House by relieving them of this labour. He was heartily disposed, on the part of the Government, if the Bill were read a second time, to agree to the proposal to refer it to a Committee in the manner he had described, and steps would be taken to appoint that Committee as soon as possible.

SIR HENRY JAMES thought that, before this serious course was taken, Notice should have been given, so that the Leaders of the House might have been present to consider it. The Government ought not to have waited for a chance suggestion of such a course before determining to recommend it. This was a matter of principle, and one which largely affected the practice and rights of the House. It was a matter of grave doubt whether they should adopt this bureau system at all. Viewed rightly, it involved a resignation by the House of some of its responsibilities. On that subject there might very well be considerable discussion; but no Notice had been given of the course which the Government now intended to take. He did not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the Bill, but only wished the House to perceive the position in which it stood. Possibly, it might be wise, ultimately, to adopt some such practices, looking to the length of time some Bills had lately taken in Committee; but it ought not to have been left till now to announce the determination to take such a course in reference to the Bill, without leaving time adequately to consider the propriety of setting up such a precedent. He also thought the Government should take the full responsibility of such a step, if it were proposed. If the demand for the Bill were so great as had been represented, the Bill ought to have come on for second reading before the 16th of July; and he did not see that, because of the lateness of the Session, when the Bill was brought before them, the House ought now to be called upon to pass an insufficient Bill, or to delegate their powers in Committee to a Select Committee. The question which had now arisen was a very broad one, and ought not to be discussed at the end of a Sitting.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS presumed that the object of every hon. Member was not to pass as many measures as possible, but to pass measures as perfect as possible; and, that being so, the only question was in what way the Bill before the House could be improved, so as to get the best measure on the subject of Bankruptcy that could be had. In order to effect that object, the course suggested from the other side of the House seemed to him the best in the circumstances. But the general question of delegating any of the powers of the House to Committee was not now before them. He believed that a large Select Committee would do the work well; but the immediate question before the House was that of the second reading of the Bill, after which the nomination of the Committee might be discussed. He hoped that they would consent to read the Bill a second time.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he understood, from what had fallen from his hon. and learned Friend behind him

(Mr. Serjeant Simon), that he intended to withdraw his Amendment; that there was, therefore, a general agreement in the House to read the Bill a second time; and that they were now considering what was to be done after they had assented to the second reading. Nobody could deny the great importance of the suggestion of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) in reference to the further stage of the Bill. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) thought, however, that it was a Bill on which the suggestion of the Committee of last year on Public Business could fitly and conveniently be tried. Nothing could be clearer than that the Bill could not be passed in the usual way this Session, and he thought the Government would have done wisely to accept the suggestion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson); but as the Government did not seem disposed to accept it, they had only the alternative of adopting the other suggestion of the hon. Member for Liverpool, or of seeing the Bill fail of passing this year. No doubt, the proposal involved certain novelties in their procedure. But he was not sure that the suggestion did not point to a very great and desirable reform that would greatly relieve Parliament in its labours. By adopting that course in reference to this Bill they were not pledged to its repetition in other cases, or to the giving up of any of their functions. He did not object to the experiment of a large Committee sitting upstairs being tried in what seemed to be a good case for it, and when there was a general desire to effect legislation. He hoped that the Government would take care to bring on the appointment of the Committee at a reasonable time, and with such notice as would enable the matter to be properly discussed by the House. It would not, he thought, be possible on the appointment of the Committee to pledge the House not to consider the measure in detail; but, still, it would be very unfair to get Members to give up their time to such a Committee, unless there was as much of an understanding as it was possible to obtain that such would be the result; and that could not be arrived at without the Government affording a full opportunity for the consideration of the proposal.

MR. A. MARTEN pointed out that if, after the second reading of the Bill, the House assented to the proposal of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone), it would have ample opportunity, when the names of the Members of the Committee were proposed, of saying how it should be constituted. Again, after the Committee had concluded its labours, it would be open to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or any other hon. Member, to move that the Bill be considered on the Report without passing through a Committee of the Whole House. A good precedent for the course recommended by the hon. Member for Liverpool was furnished by the Committee of last year on Parliamentary and Municipal Registration, of which he (Mr. A. Marten) was Chairman. Three Bills on that subject were submitted to the Select Committee, and the Committee in the result produced a Consolidated Bill, which passed through that and the other House entirely unaltered. In that case the stage of Committee of the Whole House was gone through; but as the Bill was without amendment accepted in that stage on the recommendation of the Select Committee, there was no other stage before the third reading. There would, he held, be little difficulty in adopting the present Bill as a Consolidation Bill; because the parts of it which consisted of amendments in the law would be clearly distinguished from the rest of the measure, which re-enacted the existing law.

MR. MUNDELLA believed it was the general wish of the House that the Bill should be read a second time, and that a Committee should be appointed of the kind indicated by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone). This was a very good opportunity of trying a great and important experiment in the progress of legislation, which might be fraught with important results in future Parliaments. He presumed that it would be competent for the Committee, if it was found impossible this year to deal satisfactorily with the Consolidation Clauses of the Bill, to deal only with the new provisions. Would it not be well to refer also the second Bankruptcy Bill—that of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Sampson Lloyd)—before the House, to the same Committee? That Bill had been favourably received by the trading community.

Mr. A. Marten

MR. SERJEANT SIMON also urged that the two Bills should be sent to the same Committee. He would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. MORLEY felt it to be only just to the Government to say, in reply to what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), that the proposal for a Committee had originated on his side and met with the general concurrence of both sides of the House. He was quite sure he expressed the sentiments of nine-tenths of the Members of the House who were interested in the question of Bankruptcy, when he said that the proposal, if practicable, would afford a most satisfactory mode of securing this Bill. It was most desirable that the Bill should pass during the present Session, as it would get rid of many of the most flagrant abuses in the practice of Bankruptcy. He considered it would be a great calamity to the commercial classes, if that portion of the Bill which did away with liquidation by arrangement were not secured.

MR. BARING desired to express his entire concurrence in what had just been said. It would be a serious evil if legislation were put off till next year, when there was so much likelihood of instant financial trouble.

MR. DILLWYN feared, at that particular period of the Session, that the experiment of appointing a grand Committee would not have a chance of receiving a fair trial in this case. He considered, therefore, it would be better to postpone the Bill. He thought they had better be satisfied with the present law than legislate in a hurry at the end of the Session.

SIR EDMUND LECHMERE urged the Government to postpone the Bill to a future year, and then to appoint, at an earlier period of the Session, a Select Committee, so as to have that great question thoroughly thrashed out.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE thought the House ought seriously to consider whether the proposal of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) ought to be entertained so near the close of the Session. The suggestion now made by that hon. Member had been brought before the Committee on Public Business, and did not meet with favour. The present was not the class of Bill which it was proposed by the Public Business Committee thus to treat, and he objected to its being so dealt with.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN asked who would appoint the Committee?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied that it would be done by the House.

MR. BIGGAR thought the proposal was so serious that time should be taken to consider it. He, therefore, moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN seconded the Motion for adjournment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Biggar.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER earnestly hoped that at that hour (25 minutes to 6) they would at least be allowed to read the Bill a second time. It would still remain with the House to decide at its pleasure what course it would take in regard to the appointment of the Select Committee.

MR. PARNELL urged that as the proposal made by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) and accepted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, if adopted, establish a precedent which might hereafter be used seriously to cripple the power of a minority, the House ought not hastily to assent to the second reading of the Bill.

MR. MORLEY rose to Order, and asked, whether the Question before the House was not that the Bill be now read a second time, and not the proposition of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone)?

MR. SPEAKER said, the immediate Question before the House was that the debate be now adjourned. The hon. Member for Meath was, therefore, in Order in his observations.

MR. PARNELL feared the principle of the proposal, which was all very well for a Bankruptcy Bill, if adopted, would be applied to other measures, such as Irish Coercion Bills. The hon. Member was speaking, when—

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that, it being now a quarter to 6, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow,

MOTION.

PRIVILEGE (TOWER HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE, METROPOLIS).

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Report from the Select Committee, with Minutes of Evidence, brought up, and read.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE: Perhaps I may state to the House that the Report will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow; but the evidence will not be in the hands of hon. Members until Saturday; and, therefore, what I propose to do is not to make any Motion except that the Report do lie on the Table, and that it be ordered to be printed.

Motion agreed to.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 294.]

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

(The Earl De La Warr.)

(NO. 7.) SECOND READING.

On Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on Motion for Second Reading (which stands appointed for this day),

THE LORD CHANCELLOR appealed to his noble Friend who had charge of the Bill (Earl De la Warr) to consent to a further postponement of the debate, on the ground that the Bill of the Government dealing with the same subject, and which ought to be considered by their Lordships simultaneously with his noble Friend's measure, was still in the House of Commons. He was not without hope that the Government Bill would reach their Lordships' House; and, therefore, he asked the noble Earl to postpone for a fortnight the further discussion of his Bill.

LORD NORTON expressed his regret that there should be this delay in legislating on the question. He thought that the Bill of his noble Friend was a fair proposition for discussion, and the four Bills on the subject now before Parliament only differed in degree, not in principle. If the Government Bill had been introduced in this House there might have been legislation this year, which was now very doubtful. The noble Earl had no choice but to accede to the request of the noble and learned Earl.

EARL DE LA WARR, with regret, accepted the suggestion of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. He thought the Bill of the Government had been strangely delayed in its passage through the other House; but the subject was of much importance, and he hoped that their Lordships would be enabled to deal with the Bill before the close of the Session.

Adjourned debate put off to Thursday the 31st instant.

TRAMWAYS ORDERS CONFIRMATION
BILL—(No. 135.)

(The Lord Henniker.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD HENNIKER, in moving that the House do now resolve itself into Committee on this Bill, as amended, said, that on the second reading he stated, in reply to the noble Marquess, who was not now present (the Marquess of Ripon), that his suggestion that a licence ought to be granted for the experimental use of steam on tramways, if the local authority of the district or districts in which half or more of the length of such tramway was situated did not object, should be carefully considered before the Bill was in Committee of the Whole House. He might now say that his noble Friend the President of the Board of Trade had given the matter his most careful consideration, and while fully realizing the importance of the suggestions of their Lordships' Committee who reported this Session, he had come to the conclusion, considering all the circumstances of the case, that it would not be advisable to make the Amendment suggested. So many opposite interests were involved, and so much difficulty would arise with regard to the local authorities all over the Kingdom, in the event of any alteration being made, that it had been thought desirable to adhere to the number of consents which were required by the Tramways Act now, and also by the usage of Parliament, before a tramway was laid. In the event of there being, in future, any general legislation as regarded tramways to carry into effect the other recommendations of the Committee which sat this Session, the question of the number of consents which would be required was a very serious one, and one that must be considered not only with regard to the use of steam, but also with regard to the consents for the original construction of tramways. There were some few, but not important, Amendments in the Bill. They referred entirely to the means to be adopted to compel the Tramway Companies, with the least possible expense to the public, to keep their tramways and roads in a proper state of repair. These clauses had been very carefully considered, not only by the Board of Trade, but by those who were more particularly responsible for the Private Legislation of this country, and were entirely within the spirit of the recommendations of the Report of the Select Committee upon Tramways of this Session.

House in Committee accordingly.

Amendments made : The Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

RAILWAYS—AMERICAN AND BRITISH PRODUCE—PREFERENTIAL RATES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY rose to ask, Whether the attention of the Government had been called to the preferential rates given by the Railway Companies to the carriage of foreign as compared with English agricultural produce, especially American? Since his attention had been called to the subject he had found that for many years the railways of this country had given preferential rates in favour of the carriage of imported meat from America, from the seaports at which the meat was landed, to London; and they had not confined those preferential rates to foreign meat, but had included corn also. He did not think that it was generally known that the rates for the conveyance of American meat between Liverpool and London was 25s. per ton, in quantities of not less than 10 tons, whereas the rates for the conveyance of English fresh meat were 50s. per ton; and what was more extraordinary was, that if a farmer in the North of England sent his stock to Liverpool, and was unable to sell it in the Liverpool market, and wished to send it to London, he was obliged to pay the price which was charged for sending English fresh meat. Now, this was a very serious question, and one which must seriously affect the business of farmers and graziers. They very much complained that they were over-weighted by reason of the increased rates charged them for the conveyance of their goods to London. It was not only from Liverpool that this difference was made. There was another town well known to their Lordships as a town from which large quantities of meat were sent by railway—he meant Glasgow. American meat sent from Glasgow to London was charged 60s. a-ton; whereas fresh meat brought from districts near Glasgow was carried at the consigner's risk for 70s. per ton, and at the Company's risk for 77s. per ton. These preferential rates acted most prejudicially against the farmers in the South and West of Scotland. Their Lordships could not but see that an extra rate of 10s. a-ton in favour of American meat must act very prejudicially to farmers in those districts. He was not going to mention the names of any individual railways. They had laid their heads together, and they all charged the same rates to London. He had made some inquiry into the subject, and he found that they all charged exactly alike. He had furnished the noble Lord opposite (Lord Henniker) with a table of rates. He had nothing particular to complain of with regard to the Companies themselves. They had treated him with the greatest courtesy; but still they did not deny the fact that there was a preferential difference in their charges. But what they said was this—that they would not carry the American meat at all unless they did so at a very low rate; that if they charged the American meat the same rate as the English the ships would not unload at Liverpool, but would take their cargoes straight on to London. On this point, it was only necessary for him to state the remark made by one of the managers of the railways, and that was, that unless they charged very low rates they would improve the traffic off the railways altogether. He did not know how that might be ; but, as the matter stood, he thought it could not be denied that the English and Scotch farmers had a very great grievance. It had been suggested that the Railway Commission established by the Act of 1873 would afford a remedy ; and certainly Clause 11 of that Act was very strong, because it enacted that every Railway Company or Canal Company should, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable facilities for the carriage of goods, and that no Railway Company should give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, or Company, or description of traffic over another. Now, on the face of this clause, it certainly said that no Company should give an undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to one customer over another ; but the reply of the Railway Companies to the charge was—"It is true that we do not charge the importers of foreign cattle so much as we do you, but we do not charge the English cattle rates as high as we are entitled to under the maximum charge in the Act ;" and they went on to say that they obtained a much larger profit from charging the foreign cattle at the lower rate than they did the English at the higher rate ; and that if the dealers in English fresh meat chose to send as much as the Americans did over the railways, they would be entitled to be charged at the lower rate also. Now, the English farmers said—and, it appeared to him, they said with great truth—that that was an unreasonable and undue preference of foreigners over Englishmen. He was not prepared to say that the Railway Companies were bound to carry small parcels of goods at reduced rates ; but what he did contend for was, that they ought not to be allowed to give the goods of foreigners a preferential rate, and thus, practically, prevent the English breeders and farmers from sending their produce to the London market at all. He should be very curious to hear the arguments of even the most ardent Free Trader in their Lordships' House, who would venture to get up and argue in favour of a state of things which was nothing more or less than protection of the foreign as against the English producer, although it might be in favour of the London consumer—and that, in a few words, was what it really was. There was another branch of the same subject to which he wished to call their Lordships' attention. He found that most of the Railway Companies running out of London gave a special rate in favour of foreign corn sent out of London to millers and merchants, as against English corn ; and it was a fact that, supposing a quantity of English corn were sent up to London and a quantity of foreign corn imported into the port of London, if both were required to be sent out of London for any purpose whatever, the cost would absolutely be one-third more for the carriage of the English corn than it would for the carriage of the foreign. Now, upon what principle the Railway Companies should give a preference for the carriage of foreign corn as against English corn out of London—a preference to the extent of charging a third more for English than foreign—he really could not understand. What they said was, that it was for the benefit of the local millers, who, in return for the advantages given to them, sent back a large quantity of flour to London over the lines. The practical effect upon the English farmer, however, was that he was obliged to accept for his corn the lower price by 6d., 1s., and even 1s. 6d. per quarter. If that was not pure protection by means of the Railway Companies to foreign as against English corn, he did not know what was. Now, taking into account the large quantity of agricultural produce that must or might, and in ordinary cases would be, sent by railway from one part to another, might not this proceeding on the part of the Railway Companies be called killing the goose that laid the golden egg ? He did not complain of the advantage they were giving to the foreigners so much as of the fact that they were starving the men who supported them for the purpose of enriching those who really, practically, gave them nothing in return ; and he might say that since he had placed his Notice on the Paper, he had received hundreds of letters from farmers from all parts of the country, pointing out the injury that was being done to them, and asking him to advocate in their Lordships' House a policy that would give more encouragement to the English farmer. There was one Question he should like to put to the noble Lord of posite, and that was, Whether Her Majesty's Government considered that this was a subject which would come within the scope of the inquiry of the recently appointed Commission on Agricultural Depression? He trusted also that the Government would not wait until a Ministry of Agriculture had been constituted; but that the Board of Trade would at once take the matter up, and hold out some hope to the British farmer that the injustice to which he was being subjected would be removed.

LORD HENNIKER said, he thought their Lordships would agree with him that there could be no doubt that the question to which his noble Friend opposite the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Huntly) had called the attention of the House that evening was one which deserved every consideration. The facts which his noble Friend had brought before their Lordships certainly appeared to show that the agricultural produce of Great Britain was at a considerable disadvantage as compared with the agricultural produce imported into this country, so far as the rates charged for its conveyance over the railway systems of England and Scotland were concerned. It might, perhaps, be known to their Lordships that the Board of Trade had no means by which they could tell what were the particular rates charged by any Railway Company with respect to any article. The only information they had on that point was the special Acts of each Company, which specified the maximum rates the Companies were respectively authorized to charge. He must, therefore, say that until the noble Marquess brought this question forward, the attention of the Board of Trade had not been directed to the preferential rates which he stated were given to foreign as compared with English produce by the Railway Companies. The noble Marquess was conversant with the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1873; and he understood him to ask whether the 11th section of that Act did not provide a remedy for the grievances complained of? It was, however, a question upon which he (Lord Henniker) should hesitate to give an opinion, as he could hardly undertake to place an authoritative construction upon the words of an Act of Parliament. He would ask their Lordships to allow him to read the exact words of the Act to which he referred, at the risk of reading to them what they knew already, so as to make his statement as complete as possible. The 11th section provided—

“That no Company shall make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to or in favour of any particular person or company or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or shall subject any particular person or company or any particular description of traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.”

That Act, their Lordships might remember, was passed in consequence of a recommendation of a Joint Committee of their Lordships' House and of the House of Commons, and which was formed of Members of both Houses who were well able to give an opinion upon such questions. In fact, it might be called a very strong Committee. The question of undue preference was gone into most thoroughly before that Committee, and, in consequence of the evidence given, the Act of 1873 became law. This point, however, which the noble Marquess had brought forward was one, as he had said, of great importance; and he might add that a Return, which was ordered by their Lordships' House two years ago, showing the maximum rates authorized to be charged by each Railway Company, would be shortly placed in their Lordships' hands. It would give much information as to the rates which could be levied—it would, not, however, of course, give in any way the information required as to the actual rates charged. Indeed, it was almost impossible to do so—these rates varied so much and were so constantly changed that it would be impossible to prepare such a Return to lay before the House. The noble Marquess wished to know whether the Order of Reference for the Royal Commission which was about to issue on the subject of agricultural depression would contain any specific allusion to the question which he had raised? He (Lord Henniker) could only say that, from what had passed in the other House, it would certainly appear to be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to give as large a scope to the inquiry as possible, and not to limit this important investigation to any narrow lines. If it should be found during the progress of the inquiry that the point mooted was one which could be usefully considered, there was, he thought, but little doubt that the Commissioners would feel they were in a position not to disregard a matter involving such large interests.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that as the noble Marquess had appealed to the Government on this subject, he rose to say that he fully admitted its importance. The noble Marquess had told their Lordships that he had been treated with every courtesy by the Railway Companies, who had given every information he desired, and which he had now given to their Lordships. From the statement made by the noble Marquess, it appeared that the Railway Companies had made a distinct admission that considerable inequality existed in regard to the carriage of foreign and English agricultural produce, and that, in fact, they were every day breaking the law. He must confess that, under those circumstances, he was very much surprised that no one had thought it worth while to bring the matter before the notice of the Railway Commission. The noble Marquess alluded to the 11th clause of the Act of 1873; but he did not quote what appeared to him to be the still stronger provision in Clause 90 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which enacted that a Railway Company should not vary their tolls for the purpose of favouring any particular person, but that all such tolls should at all times be charged equally to all persons and after the same rate for goods of the same description conveyed under the same circumstances. Therefore, he thought it quite possible that when the circumstances became fully known, the remedy for the evil complained of might be found in the existing law.

LORD SELBORNE said, he did not rise to speak with any authority upon such a matter; but he had a strong impression that the kind of remedy which the noble Duke sketched out was, some years ago, tried in the Court of Common Pleas in a case of Oxlade v. the North Eastern Railway Company, in which a coalowner considered himself aggrieved with the carrying regulations of the Railway Company. But he believed the decision of the Court was not quite consistent with the interpretation of the clause which the noble Duke thought was clear upon the face of it. Whether the decision was right or wrong, he would not pretend to say, but it had never been appealed from to the House of Lords.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE.

QUESTION.

MR. A. MOORE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When he intends to introduce the Supplementary Estimate for the Zulu War?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that he stated some time ago that he intended to present the Supplementary Estimate before the end of the present month, and he hoped to be able to carry out that intention.

INDIA—NORTH-WEST FRONTIER.

QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is now in a position to name the time at which in accordance with assurances given by him, he will make a statement with reference to the position of affairs on the north-west frontier of India; and, whether, if full explanation can then be given without inconvenience to the public service, he will, on that occasion, inform the House for what objects the recent war was carried on, and what advantages have accrued from it to England or to India?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I understand that a despatch is coming from the Government of India, giving full details of the negotiations with Yakoub Khan; and when that despatch arrives we shall, no doubt, be in a position to lay it on the Table of the House. Then it will be possible to have a fair discussion, if it is desired; but I really cannot undertake to anticipate the discussion which may then take place.

INLAND REVENUE — PROBATE, ADMINISTRATION, AND LEGACY DUTIES.—QUESTION.

MR. DODDS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What steps he proposes to take in order to give effect to the Resolution of the House upon the Motion of the honourable Member for East Sussex on the subject of Probate, Administration, and Legacy Duties?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that any steps which might be proposed to give effect to the Resolution of the House with regard to these duties would involve legislation of a complicated and difficult character, such as it would not be convenient to undertake at a late period of the Session. It would rather be for consideration in another Session, if anything ought to be done.

SURVEYORS OF VESSELS IN THE BLACK SEA.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it be the fact that in 1875 or 1876 Her Majesty's Government caused surveyors to be appointed at certain of the Black Sea ports to see that vessels were loaded in conformity to the Merchant Shipping Acts; and, if so, at what ports these were appointed; and, whether any of these surveyors have since been dismissed, or the survey discontinued; and, if so, at what ports this has been done, when, and for what reason?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the Consuls were directed to appoint Surveyors at Taganrog, Nicolaieff, Galatz, Sulina, Berdianski, and Kertch, in 1875. They were given up by my Predecessor at the Board of Trade in December, 1877, as the system was, I am informed, found to have failed in its object, owing to many reasons. Among others, great difficulty was experienced by the Consuls in obtaining persons who were at once trustworthy, independent, and competent to undertake the inspection of grain-laden vessels; and the results, after careful investigation, appeared to be unsatisfactory and inadequate; and in the case of an inquiry before the Wreck Commissioner, it was found that when the master or owner was distinctly in fault for not having complied with the Act, he could not be dealt with because the Surveyor at the foreign port had passed the ship. I shall be happy to look over the Papers upon this subject, and to show such as throw light upon the matter to the hon. Gentleman.

EAST INDIA MUSEUM, SOUTH KENSINGTON.—QUESTIONS.

MR. WAIT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, in view of the forthcoming abolition of the Indian Museum, and the disposition of its contents, he will be prepared favourably to consider applications from provincial museums connected with schools of art for portions of the collection?

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, before the Secretary of State for India finally decides on the dispersion of the India Museum, he will state to the House what is proposed to be done with the various portions of the collection; and, whether he will have any objection to lay upon the Table any Memorials relating to the establishment in London of an Indian Museum, addressed to Her Majesty's Government by the Association of Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom, and by the Chambers of Commerce of Manchester, Liverpool, Bradford, Birmingham, and Glasgow, or any other documents bearing on the subject?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, the Secretary of State in Council has finally decided on the removal of the collections now in the India Museum for the reasons

I stated the other day, and a Committee has been appointed to consider the details of the arrangement. The important subject raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Wait)—namely, applications from Provincial museums connected with Schools of Art for portions of the collection—has been specially referred to it, and I can assure him it shall not be lost sight of. With regard to those portions of the collection in which my hon. Friend the Member for Cheshire (Mr. W. Egerton) is specially interested, and as to which his advice would be of the greatest value, I hope he will consent to put himself into communication with the Committee. There is no particular objection to the production of the Memorials mentioned by my hon. Friend, except that it would appear to involve a very useless expense, as they have already been printed and made public, and refer to wholly different proposals from those which are now made.

MR. E. JENKINS asked, Whether, before the dispersion of the collection, an opportunity would be given the House to consider the subject?

MR. RATHBONE asked, Whether, before the dispersion, an opportunity would be given the large towns to see the collection in its entire state?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, he was afraid he could not give the engagement the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) asked for, because it would involve the postponement of the matter until next Session, and would impose additional expense on India. He hoped the House would be content to allow the Executive to carry out the details in such a manner as they might be advised by competent persons. With regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone), he did not see how it was possible to send round to the large towns the whole of the collection. [MR. RATHBONE: Or portions of it?] In any case, if what the hon. Gentleman asked was done, it certainly could not be at the cost of the revenues of India.

AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION COMMISSION—INDIAN WHEAT.—QUESTION.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Report on Indian Wheat by Dr. Forbes Watson, which has been present to the House, will be referred to the Royal Commission on Agricultural Depression?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir; there would be no objection to that.

ARMY—THE 60TH RIFLES—CASE OF COLOUR-SERGEANT DICKATY. QUESTION.

MR. PRICE asked the Judge Advocate General, Whether it is true that Colour-Sergeant Dickaty of the 60th Rifles was recently tried by court martial in South Africa and sentenced to five years' penal servitude for misbehaviour before the enemy; whether it is true that the prisoner has been brought to England, released, and ordered to rejoin his regiment at Winchester in his original rank of Colour-Sergeant; if he will state the description of court martial, i.e. whether general or district, before which the prisoner was tried, the exact charge on which the prisoner was arraigned, and the sentence of the court passed upon him; whether the sentence was confirmed by the officer convening the court; whether the sentence was subsequently remitted; or whether the proceedings of the court martial were quashed; and, whether the fact of his having been so tried will be recorded against him in the Regimental Defaulters' Book?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: Sir, Colour-Sergeant Dickaty was tried by general court martial on the 6th day of April last, under the 52nd Article of War, upon the charge of "shamefully abandoning a post which it was his duty to defend." The court found him guilty of the charge, and inflicted a sentence of reduction to the ranks and five years' penal servitude. The finding and sentence of the court were confirmed on the 6th day of April last, and the prisoner was sent home without delay. The proceedings of the court were submitted to me in due course on the 13th day of June last, when I was of opinion that the evidence adduced for the prosecution did not legally warrant the finding, and I, therefore, advised the confirming officer that the finding was not in conformity with law, and that the prisoner ought not to be made subject to the consequences of the conviction. The opinion I thus expressed was communicated to the Horse Guards, and I am informed that Colour-Sergeant Dickaty was immediately released on his arrival in England and returned to his duty at Winchester.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—HORLEY SCHOOL BOARD.

QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he is aware that on the 16th of June the School Board of Horley, Surrey, at the instance of the Rev. E. J. Peckover, the chairman, refused to appoint Ada Thomas as a pupil teacher solely on the ground that she was a Nonconformist, though her character and qualifications were otherwise unexceptional, and no other candidate appeared for the office; and, whether steps will be taken to prevent a repetition on the part of the Board of a similar proceeding?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, I have seen in the newspapers the statement referred to by the hon. Gentleman. I have also received a letter from the Rev. E. J. Peckover, in which he states that it is not true that the Board of which he is chairman rejected Ada Thomas as pupil teacher solely on the ground that she was a Nonconformist. There were other reasons why Miss Thomas was not appointed, one reason being that the master of the school had deterred other candidates from coming forward who might have been eligible. The letter also showed that the previous pupil teacher who was appointed was a Nonconformist. Much as I object personally to any exhibition of religious intolerance, I am bound to say that I find it pretty evenly distributed, and that if any regulation were made by the Education Department interfering with the discretion of managers and dictating to them whom they might or might not employ, the Education Act in this country would be very difficult to work.

ARMY—ARTILLERY—THE NORDENFELT GUN.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether the "Nordenfelt" gun, stated to have been adopted by this Country, is the same as the "Palmerantz" mitrailleuse; and, whether any and how many of these weapons have been ordered, and what are the terms of the contract?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL, in reply, said, that the "Nordenfelt" gun was very much the same as the "Palmerantz" mitrailleuse; and, as the pattern under which it had been supplied was that of Mr. Nordenfelt, it was known by that name. It was understood that Mr. Nordenfelt had improved upon the "Palmerantz," and 100 guns had been ordered for the sea service. It was unusual to make the terms of a contract public, but he should be glad to show them to the hon. and gallant Gentleman privately.

IRELAND—THE DONEGAL FISHERIES —CORRESPONDENCE.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has any objection to place upon the Table of the House the Correspondence that has passed between Mr. William Sinclair, of county Donegal, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland, relative to the management of the fisheries in the county Donegal by Mr. Brady, inspector of fisheries?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I have no objection to placing a Copy of this Correspondence on the Table of the House; but, perhaps, as the Question is only of local interest, the hon. and gallant Gentleman will be satisfied if a Copy is placed on the Table and not printed.

CRIMINAL LAW—RELEASE OF ANN BRADLEY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that the Government have released from punishment Ann Bradley, convicted of and sentenced to fourteen years' penal servitude for an attempt to murder an aged lady, Miss Emily Geoghagan, at Morehampton Road, Dublin, in 1875, that attempt having been made with more than usual barbarity; and, whether he is aware that Miss Geoghagan, in terror of the released convict, is now compelled to live out of Ireland, and is still suffering seriously from the effects of the murderous attempt upon her life?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I believe the facts of this case are substantially as stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman. As a general principle, I am strongly opposed to the plan of releasing convicts so long before the expiration of their sentences; but in this instance it appears that Bradley was released in 1876 in consequence of a medical report to the effect that she was suffering from consumption, and that further incarceration would be endangering her life. As she seems to have been discharged without a ticket-of-leave, the Government has now no power to do more than assure Miss Geoghagan of the fullest protection, which the police have been instructed to afford her, in the event of her returning to Ireland.

MR. SULLIVAN: Sir, would the right hon. Gentleman allow me to ask him on whose responsibility was this woman released after so short an incarceration on so long a sentence without a ticket-of-leave?

MR. J. LOWTHER: She was discharged in consequence of the medical report I have alluded to, on the ground of her life being in danger.

COPYRIGHT LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Postmaster General, When the Government Copyright Bill will be printed and in the hands of Members; and, whether any arrangement has been come to with the United States Government for the appointment of a joint International Commission on Copyright, as proposed by Messrs. Harper Brothers, of New York, or whether any such Commission is in contemplation?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, I hope before the end of the month to ask leave to introduce a Bill on the subject of Copyright. As to the second part of the Question, no arrangement has been come to with the United States Government for the appointing of an International Commission, nor am I aware that any such arrangement is in contemplation.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SALARIES OF SCHOOLMASTERS.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether his attention has been directed to the constantly increasing expenditure of Schools under the Education Act, by the employment of masters with a high art certificate at a much higher salary than a man without such an extra qualification could command (namely, an ordinary certificated master) with the avowed object of making the school earn much more, such extra earning and extra learning eventually coming out of the pockets of the ratepayers; whether it was originally contemplated and intended by the Education Act of 1870 that such a result should ensue at such an extra cost to the ratepayers, especially in rural districts; and, whether the Government intend taking any steps to discourage such extra cost being incurred by placing a limit to the salaries to be paid to schoolmasters, or, at all events, by making those who desire to receive such a high education pay the extra expense of it themselves instead of throwing it on the ratepayers as now is the case?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, no doubt, the salaries of masters have considerably risen during the last few years, partly owing to an increased demand and partly to the higher qualifications of the teachers. No doubt, school managers do sometimes pay a higher salary in order to attract a more competent master, but as this is entirely optional on their part, I can hardly interfere with their discretion as exactly to prescribe the salaries which they may or may not pay to those whom they employ, although, I think, it is advisable to make the payment of school fees to a great extent dependent upon the character of the education given.

ARMY AND NAVY EXCHANGES.

QUESTION.

MR. BIDDULPH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether in the case of a midshipman who has passed his examination for his sub-Lieutenancy, and who wishes to exchange into the Army, and being eligible in other respects, as to age and good conduct, he sees any reason why he should not be placed in as favourable a position as a Militia Officer who has served his two trainings and passed the examination required of him for a commission in the Army; and whether, he will consider the propriety of altering the regulations which at present will not permit him to do so?

—Mr. J. Lowther

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, he had not had time to look very strictly into the matter, but he was informed the conditions of the service were entirely different. The experience required in a sub-lieutenant in the Navy would scarcely be equivalent to that of a Militia officer in the case supposed. But a sub-lieutenant in the Navy, if not disqualified by age, would still be able to enter the Army through the Militia.

POST OFFICE CONTRACTS—PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM COMPANY.—QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he has obtained or will obtain information as to whether the new Postal Contract between the Government of Victoria and the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company will or will not be carried out, should the new Postal Contract between Her Majesty's Government and the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company not receive the sanction of Parliament?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Sir, I have not obtained any information on this subject. I would consider if I could properly ask for it, if the hon. Member could suggest to me any reason on which I could base the request. But if I rightly understand the Question, it seems to me that I should hardly be justified in asking the parties to this contract, with which we have nothing to do, to inform me what, in their opinion, their legal position might be with regard to it in a contingency which I trust may not arise.

AFGHANISTAN—WAR CORRESPONDENTS.—QUESTIONS.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If any reply has been received from General Roberts, explaining his reasons for dismissing from his head-quarters Mr. M'Pherson, the correspondent of one of the London daily newspapers, and for the appointment by him of one of his own staff to act as correspondent; and, if there is any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence relative to this subject?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, in accordance with the promise made to the House, I caused a letter to be written to General

Roberts on this subject, and have received from him a reply which, with the permission of the House, I will read—

“Head-quarters, Kurram Column, Camp Kurram, April 18, 1879.

“On Mr. M'Pherson receiving his dismissal from my camp, I gave him to understand that, in the interests of The Standard newspaper, I would appoint some officer in this force to carry on the duties of correspondent until such time as an accredited successor should arrive. My selection for the moment fell upon Captain Pretyma, my aide-de-camp, for the following reasons:—1. At the time of the assault on the Peiwar Kotal, when Mr. M'Pherson was on the sick list and unable to witness the operations, he requested Captain Pretyma to write a telegram and letters to The Standard describing the action of the 2nd of December and subsequent operations. On my consenting to this arrangement Captain Pretyma performed this service for Mr. M'Pherson. The telegram and the two letters appeared in due time in the columns of The Standard, and under the head of ‘From our Special Correspondent.’ On more than one occasion later on Mr. M'Pherson requested Captain Pretyma to write military letters descriptive of the operations of this column. All of these were written and signed by Captain Pretyma. 2. Mr. Boyle, the special correspondent of The Standard with the Candahar column, had requested Captain Pretyma, with whom he travelled from London to Bombay in October last, to write any military letters descriptive of the operations of the Kurram column which he might feel disposed to send to The Standard. Bearing in mind these facts, I naturally came to the conclusion that Captain Pretyma was the officer especially designated by circumstances to fulfil the duties of correspondent to The Standard during the interim which might elapse before Mr. M'Pherson's successor should arrive. Within 24 hours of my making the offer to Captain Pretyma, Mr. M'Pherson, on leaving the camp, signified to me his wish that another officer—namely, Captain Woodthorpe, R.E.—should take up the duties of correspondent. I immediately sent for that officer and asked him to act, an arrangement which was more acceptable, for obvious reasons, both to myself and to my aide-de-camp. Captain Woodthorpe then sent telegrams and letters to The Standard until relieved of this duty, very shortly afterwards, by order of his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. With regard to the military correspondents of other London papers, neither of the officers representing The Times and Daily Telegraph belonged to the Head-quarter Staff of the Kurram Column.

“FRED. ROBERTS, M.G., Commanding Kurram Field Force.”

Afterwards—

MR. OTWAY said: Sir, I desire to put a Question on this subject to the Secretary of State for War. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India read just now a despatch from the general officer commanding in the Kurram Valley. In that despatch there is an account of a controversy which occurred between the general officer and the correspondent of a daily London paper, and he announced, if I gathered the words of the despatch correctly, that he had appointed as a correspondent of that paper an officer on full pay on his own staff. He further announced that an officer had been appointed from the Candahar column to correspond for a London daily newspaper, and also that he had entertained proposals from the correspondent of this newspaper that a captain of Engineers should be appointed in his place. ["Order, order!"] I am strictly in Order, as I am only quoting from what has been already read, and out of which arises the Question I now wish to address to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. I desire, first of all, to ask him, Whether it is consistent with discipline—indeed, whether there is not a positive Order prohibiting officers on full pay from corresponding for the Press; secondly, whether it is true that the commander of the Kurram Valley Force appointed an officer as correspondent; and, thirdly, if this was so, whether the officer was relieved from duty for that purpose, whether there was a sufficiency or redundancy of officers in order to allow of one on full pay and active employment being designated for the additional duty of correspondent for a London daily newspaper?

COLONEL STANLEY: If the hon. Gentleman will be kind enough to give Notice I shall be happy to answer that Question. He is aware, perhaps, that the officers in the Army are for some purposes entirely under the Indian Government, and I should hardly like to speak of a matter arising out of the Queen's Regulations in that country without having the opportunity of some reference to the India Office to see where our responsibility begins and where it ends.

SOUTH AFRICA—SIR GARNET WOLSELEY'S INSTRUCTIONS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will lay upon the Table, as promised, the instructions issued to Sir Garnet Wolseley on his appointment to command in South Africa, especially with regard to acceptable terms of peace?

Mr. Otway

COLONEL STANLEY: I am unable to comply with the request of the hon. and learned Gentleman, for the simple reason that there are no such instructions. The only instructions given by me or the military authorities to Sir Garnet Wolseley were verbal, and they were simply to this effect, as I believe I have stated once before—he was desired to use every effort to bring the war to a successful close as early as possible and to insure an honourable peace.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has any objection to lay on the Table the instructions to Sir Garnet Wolseley, which it was stated at the time would be printed as soon as circumstances would permit?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, there was a letter containing general instructions sent to Sir Garnet Wolseley with his commissions, which will be laid on the Table before the Vote of Credit is taken.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONVICTION OF AMBROSE PENTNEY.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a paragraph in the "Daily News" of the 14th instant, headed "Singular Conviction," in which it is stated that on Monday last Ambrose Pentney was brought before the bench of magistrates at Mistley, on a charge of neglecting his work for an hour and a-half, and ordered to pay five shillings; that it was stated the man was attracted to a house near where he was employed by cries of murder, and on entering it found that a madman was struggling with his keeper, and would probably have murdered him, and that was the time he was off from his work; and, whether he will cause the matter to be inquired into, and, if possible, the order for the payment of the money and costs stayed?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that according to a letter he had received from the chairman of the magistrates, this was not a conviction, but a civil proceeding, with which, of course, he could not interfere. The facts of the case had been represented to him as being somewhat different from those set forth in the Question. It appeared that the man was absent from his employment for two days, and his absence was the cause of some loss to the farmer who employed him, in consequence of two horses being kept idle. No doubt, the man was asked by the relieving officer to assist a warder in taking charge of a lunatic; but the relieving officer, on the second day, told the man that he should have obtained the permission of the farmer who employed him. The relieving officer paid him 20s. for his services for the two days, and the magistrate thought the man ought to recoup the farmer for the loss he had sustained to the extent of 5s. out of the 20s. The complainant waived all demands for costs, which were not paid. At the termination of the case, the magistrate congratulated the parties on the matter being satisfactorily settled between employer and employed without any painful feeling being left on either side.

TRAMWAYS ACT, 1870—REPAIR OF LINES.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, By whose authority the Tramway Company or Companies using the Blackfriars Road and the Old Kent Road have, as regards the first-mentioned road, broken up the entire surface of all the roadway, leaving heavy ground for carriages and other vehicles to pass over, and, in the latter case, have only left one passage for vehicles, causing great delay in the traffic; and, by what authority the Tramway Company in the Old Kent Road is allowed to alter the level of the road, thereby forcing all carriages and vehicles to drive over rubbish nearly eighteen inches high from the old level to the new?

VISCOUNT SANDON: This is a matter which rests with the local authorities, and the Board of Trade has no business to interfere with it, for it has no power; but I may inform my hon. and gallant Friend that the tramways in question were authorized by the Pimlico, Peckham, and Greenwich Street Tramways Act, 1870, 33 & 34 Vict. cap. 174. By Section 14 of that Act and by the provisions of the general Tramways Act of 1870, the Tramway Company were bound to make arrangements with the local authorities before they commenced to break up the streets. The matter rests entirely with the local authorities;

the Board of Trade has no information as to the facts to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman refers, and has no power of interference.

POOR LAW — SPIRITUAL MINISTRATIONS IN WALSALL WORKHOUSE.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table Copy of Correspondence between his Department and the Poor Law authorities and Catholic clergymen in Walsall as to recent complaints of neglect or hindrance of spiritual ministrations to sick and dying paupers in Walsall Workhouse?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, there would be no objection to the production of the Papers, if the hon. and learned Gentleman would move for them.

LAW OF SUCCESSION IN MAHOMEDAN STATES.—QUESTIONS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Foreign Office is in possession of information which can be laid before the House respecting the Law, or customs regulating the succession in the Royal and reigning families of Turkey, Persia, Morocco, Zanzibar, and Tunis?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, there is a great deal of Correspondence in the Foreign Office on the subject; but I am not prepared to state just now that it is of sufficient importance to justify its being laid before Parliament. However, my hon. Friend can peruse it and communicate with me, and if it is worth while to make it public, there is no objection to do so. According to the best authorities I can consult, there is no written law of succession in Mahomedan countries, but the matter is decided in different nations according to custom. With regard to the countries mentioned, I could not give any information within the limits of an Answer to a Question; but, generally, I may say there is no written law, and the succession is determined by dynastic or political considerations.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the India Office is in possession of any information which can be laid before the House respecting the Laws or customs regulating the succession in the Royal and reigning families of Afghanistan and other Mahomedan States in India?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, a great deal of information on this subject has already at different times been laid before Parliament; but the fact is, that the laws and customs regulating the succession in the Royal and governing families in the Mahomedan States of India are so various that it is impossible, within reasonable limits, to give any further information which would show the existence of any fixed rule upon the subject, further than was pointed out in Lord Canning's adoption despatch in April, 1860.

THE RIVERS CONSERVANCY BILL—A ROYAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, seeing that the Government have withdrawn their Rivers Conservancy Bill, while the need of legislation on the subject is becoming daily more pressing, the Government will consent to the issue of a Royal Commission to examine into the condition of one or more selected river basin areas, and to report upon the best means of constituting a conservancy authority, and upon the fairest practical principles of rating and representation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Government have considered the question, and they are not of opinion that it would be desirable, at present, to appoint a Royal Commission.

THE RAILWAY COMMISSION CONTINUANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the President of the Board of Trade, If the Government mean without fail to introduce a measure, before the close of the present Session, providing for the continuance of the Railway Commission?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, it is certainly the intention of the Government to propose to the House to continue the Railway Commission, and we should propose to continue it for not less than three years.

Sir H. Drummond Wolff

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT).—FEMALE CLERKS.

QUESTION.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is a fact that some years ago the salaries of telegraph clerks were fixed, according to a classification then arranged, at the following rates: Probationary 8s. to 14s. a-week; Third Class 14s. to 17s.; Second Class 17s. to 24s.; Maximum 30s.; whether it is true that during the last three to four years no female clerk has been promoted beyond the third class, and that vacancies in the superior classes have been filled up in all cases by the promotion of male clerks; and, whether it is intended by the department that 17s. a-week shall be the maximum allowed to female clerks, however competent and whatever the length of their service; and, if not, if he would state why no promotion of female clerks into the second class has been recently permitted?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, in 1872 the scale was fixed as follows:—Probationers, 8s. to 14s. per week; third class, 14s. to 17s.; second class, 18s. to 24s.; and first class, 25s. to 30s. With a slight alteration which worked beneficially, that scale is still in operation, but the exigencies of the Service have recently required the appointment of more male clerks. The question of the promotion of the female clerks is, however, now under consideration, and it is not intended that 17s. per week should be the maximum allowed to female clerks.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN pointed out that the noble Lord had not replied to the second part of his Question.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I thought I had explained that recently, owing to the exigencies of the Public Service, male clerks have been more largely employed, and especially for night and newspaper work, and consequently there has been a delay in the promotion of female clerks.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CONVICT PERRYMAN.—QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will grant permission to Mr. Elworthy, parliamentary agent of the Criminal Law Amendment Association, to take with him to the gaol where Perryman is incarcerated a Commissioner to take a statutory declaration of the prisoner, and for him to sign a Petition to the House of Commons setting forth his innocence, of which the Society is satisfied, and that Mr. Elworthy and the Council of the Society may have access to the handkerchief with which the deceased was hanged?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he could not understand why this application was not made to him in the usual form at the Home Office, instead of by way of Question in the House. He was not prepared to deviate from the rules and the usual practice as to visits to convicts under penal servitude. The prisoner was at liberty to sign any statement or Petition to the Secretary of State if he desired, but he could not be allowed to be visited by a legal officer with a Petition prepared by others outside. The handkerchief in question was produced at the trial, and was handed over to the police, who would certainly allow it to be inspected under proper restrictions; and one gentleman interested in the prisoner's case was so informed some time ago.

CHARTERED BANKS (COLONIAL) BILL. QUESTION.

MR. FRESHFIELD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When he proposes to proceed with the Bill relating to Colonial Chartered Banks?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, this is a Bill that has received a good deal of consideration, and I am now only waiting for an opportunity of introducing it. I have hitherto rather delayed its introduction, with the view of avoiding any confusion between that Bill and the Banking and Joint Stock Companies Bill.

THE AFGHAN WAR—VOTE OF THANKS TO THE ARMY.—QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to move a Vote of Thanks to the Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers, and Men of Her Majesty's European and Native forces for their gallant conduct during the recent Afghan War?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir, it is the intention of the Government to propose such a Vote of Thanks, but I am not at the present moment able to say on what day it will be done.

THE AGRICULTURAL COMMISSION— THE COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the House may expect that Her Majesty's Ministers will inform this House of the names of the persons whom Her Majesty will appoint as Commissioners, in accordance with the Address voted by this House on the 5th of this month, recommending that inquiry be made as to the depressed condition of the agricultural interest, and into the causes to which this is attributable; whether these causes are of a temporary or of a permanent character; and how far they have been created by and can be remedied by legislation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Government have been engaged in carefully considering the proper composition of the Commission. This is a matter of considerable importance, and cannot be settled in a hurry. I can safely assure the House and my hon. Friend that no delay will take place in communicating to the House the names of the Commissioners as soon as they have been decided upon.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND)— ALLEGED PROPOSAL OF THE GOVERNMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the case, as has been alleged, that a proposal on the subject of Irish University Education was made not long since on behalf of the Irish Executive, and that a Petition in favour of this proposal, very influentially signed by the Roman Catholics of Ireland, was forwarded to the Prime Minister; and, if such proposal was made, whether he will inform the House of its nature; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Irish University Bill this Session; and, if so, on what day the Second Reading will be taken?

MR. J. LOWTHER: No, Sir, it is not the case that any proposal on the subject of University Education in Ireland has ever been made by the Irish Executive. At the same time, I need hardly say that private communications, unofficially conducted, have from time to time passed upon this, as upon most other subjects of public interest in Ireland, between Members of the Irish Government and persons representing or holding various religious opinions, a course which the experience of successive Governments has found conducive to the interests of Public Business. The hon. Gentleman asks whether a Petition, very influentially signed by the Roman Catholics of Ireland, was forwarded to the Prime Minister? I find that three Memorials, or Declarations, as they appear to be called, have been received by the Prime Minister. Two of these were from the Roman Catholic laity of Ireland, and are already in the hands of hon. Members as Parliamentary Papers. The third, which emanates from the Catholic Union of Ireland, will also be laid upon the Table. I find, on referring to these documents, that one of them expresses itself as follows:—

"We, the undersigned, deem it to be our duty to reiterate the opinions expressed by the Roman Catholic laity of Ireland in the year 1869 on University Education in Ireland."

It then goes on to reiterate the opinions previously expressed at the date referred to. The other two documents urge the adoption of the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don). In none of them, however, is there any reference to any supposed proposal from anybody else. It certainly is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Irish University Bill this Session, and I hope the second reading may be taken in the course of next week; but, in the present state of Business, I cannot name any particular day.

MR. SULLIVAN: Is it not the fact, that on the basis of those semi-official understandings, proposals, or negotiations, a satisfactory conclusion was arrived at at the time, and that the proposal now before Parliament is almost a complete departure from that understanding?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I have already frankly stated everything I know, and pointed out that there were no proposals or arrangements, semi-official or otherwise, and I must leave the House to form its own opinion upon the matter.

J. Lowther

CRIMINAL LAW—THE STRIPPING AND SEARCHING OF PRISONERS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the practice of stripping and searching all persons taken to police stations, whether male or female, or whether charged with criminal offences or not; whether the indiscriminate searching of persons, if it be so, not charged with any criminal act is necessary; and, whether the method of searching is properly conducted and not of a sort, as has been frequently alleged, to outrage decency and propriety?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS was understood to reply that persons charged with felony and certain misdemeanours, and also drunken and riotous persons, were searched on being received at the police station, in order to secure the safe custody of their property, and to deprive them of any dangerous weapons while in custody. The search, however, was always conducted in the cell, and as decently as possible. In the case of female prisoners, a female searcher was appointed for the purpose. No complaint of any outrage upon decency had ever reached the Commissioner of Police, and if any case of that kind came before him (Mr. Assheton Cross), he would take care that the offender was punished.

MR. SHERIDAN asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had not been informed that a murderous conflict had taken place at Derby owing to the searching of a prisoner?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS replied in the negative, and asked the hon. Gentleman to repeat the Question on Monday.

SCOTCH BILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. R. W. DUFF asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is his intention to proceed with the Poor Law (Scotland) Bill and the Valuation of Lands and Assessments (Scotland) Bill during the present Session?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. Watson): Sir, I propose to ask the leave of the House to withdraw the Poor Law (Scotland) Bill, and to introduce in lieu of it a short measure containing those five clauses which deal with medical relief and the superannuation of poorhouse officials. I propose, also, by leave of the House, to withdraw the Valuation Bill.

INDIA—THE NORTH-WEST FRONTIER.
QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In reference to an answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for the Elgin Burghs a short time ago, I should like to know, Whether the Government have departed from the intention which they announced at the beginning of the Session, and afterwards on the adjournment for the Easter Holidays, of making themselves a statement on the position of affairs on the North-West Frontier. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he intended shortly to lay a despatch on the Table. I wish to know whether, on the production of these Papers, a discussion will arise? I think the right hon. Gentleman once said he intended himself to call attention to the position of these affairs. I should like to know whether that is still his intention?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I had forgotten the precise circumstances to which the noble Lord refers; but there will be no indisposition on the part of the Government to afford, or, if necessary, to make, an opportunity for a statement in regard to the position of affairs on the North-West Frontier of India. I have no desire to evade any arrangement which may have been made; but I had forgotten the circumstances to which the noble Lord refers.

PRIVATE BILLS (GROUP A)—TOWER
HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE (METROPOLIS)
BILL—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

MOTION.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: A few days ago, the House appointed a Select Committee to consider a question of Privilege. The Report of that Committee was presented yesterday afternoon by the Chairman, and we are promised the evidence in a few days, and I think we shall get it probably on Saturday. I think it will be convenient that we should wait until we have the evidence in our hands, and have had time to read and consider it, and I will, therefore, now move that the Report of the Select Committee on Privilege, Tower High Level Bridge Metropolis Committee, be taken into consideration on Tuesday next at 2 o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. DILLWYN,
THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that with regard to the Business of to-morrow, he could do no more than refer to the position of the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill. He did not know whether it was to be anticipated that the Report would be agreed to to-day. If it were not, it would be proceeded with at a Morning Sitting to-morrow. In any circumstances, he hoped they would be able to close the consideration of the Report to-morrow, and be allowed to read the Bill a third time, to avoid the inconvenience of a Saturday Sitting, which would otherwise be necessary. With regard to Monday next, it would be necessary to take Supply, and the first Votes to be taken would be those for the Queen's University and Queen's Colleges, and the other Irish Votes.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION
BILL—[BILL 245.]

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration." — (Colonel Stanley).

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In rising, Sir, to move the Amendment of which I have given Notice, namely—

"That no Bill for the Discipline and Regulation of the Army will be satisfactory to this House which provides for the permanent retention of corporal punishment for military offences;"

it is necessary that I should say a few words in explanation of the reasons which have induced me to take this step—a course which differs somewhat from that which was discussed on Tuesday last. The House will recollect very well the general character of that discussion, and I think it unnecessary that I should refer to it at any length. But it is desirable that I should remind the House that on that day I stated my views on the position of the question of corporal punishment in consequence of the action of the Government on the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, and I made a suggestion to the Government. I stated my view that after what had passed it would be impossible that corporal punishment could be retained permanently in the Army, except in a very limited class of cases, and I made a suggestion which I thought would be acceptable in the circumstances. Now, Sir, I find that there has been some misapprehension as to what exactly the scope of the suggestion I made was, and, perhaps, it is desirable that I should repeat it. I stated that I, and a good many hon. Members on this side—on all sides, I believe—appeared to be considerably impressed by one of the arguments put forward by supporters of corporal punishment—that, on active service and in a certain class of circumstances, there might be no alternative to the commanding officer but to inflict the punishment of death; that the cases in which corporal punishment is inflicted were few in number and that, as I have said, there might be no alternative but to inflict the punishment of death instead of corporal punishment. Well, Sir, in order to meet that argument, I suggested to Her Majesty's Government the adoption of a clause which had been laid on the Table, but was subsequently withdrawn, by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood); and in order that there might be no misconception as to the meaning of Parliament in passing the clause, in order that it might be made quite clear that it was not proposed that the sentence of death should be recorded merely for the purpose of corporal punishment being inflicted, but that the intention was to confer on the commanding officer a power of commutation in cases where he thought the recorded punishment of death should not be inflicted, I took the somewhat unusual course of suggesting that there should be prefixed to that clause a Preamble by which that intention might be expressed. Sir, that proposal was very definitely rejected by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. I also stated that, in my opinion, if that suggestion could not be accepted, there was no alternative for me and those who agreed in the view I took, as the matter then stood, but to vote for the total abolition of corporal punishment. Well, Sir, a discussion ensued, and turned principally upon the mode in which the question could be most conveniently brought before the deliberation of the House; and the course which was finally considered to be most convenient, certainly, the course which I should myself have preferred to take, was to wait until we came to the clause referring to corporal punishment, and then, by moving the omission of a very few words, the question of the retention of corporal punishment might have been raised in the simplest possible form. But it appeared, upon further consideration of the matter, that it was necessary that the new clauses should be moved and considered first, as they would take precedence of the Bill itself, and that it was likely there would be a very considerable amount of discussion upon the earlier clauses of the Bill, those clauses which refer to the cases in which the punishment of death could be inflicted, and in which, according to the present proposal of the Government, corporal punishment might be inflicted instead. There would, therefore, have been a considerable amount of discussion upon details as to the limit and operation of this punishment before we arrived at the main question itself; and I think hon. Members on both sides of the House will be agreed that by far the more convenient course is to express an opinion in the first instance on the main question—as I hope, without any very long delay—and that, having expressed this opinion, we might proceed to the consideration of the details. I, therefore, Sir, thought it was the more convenient course for both sides that the question should be raised in a plain, simple manner by this Amendment, which will enable the House to come to a conclusion on that question of principle. Now, Sir, I have very little to add to-day to what I said on Tuesday as to the ground which had induced me to take this course. I am not in the least surprised to find, as I have found, that the course I have taken has been imputed to Party motives of no very exalted character; but I must say I am surprised that the first charge of that character should have come, not from the Members of the Government who have seats in this House, who have a knowledge of what has occurred upon this Bill, and who heard the statement I made on Tuesday last, but that it should have come from a noble Lord, a Member of the Government, and not in his place in Parliament, but at a Party meeting of his own supporters held last night. I find that Lord Cranbrook said—

“I see that only last night the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, having apparently entirely changed his vote, if he has not changed his opinion, attributed it to something the Government had never done and which a Conservative Government had never said.”

The noble Lord appears to have forgotten that his Colleagues, the Secretary of State for War and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, were opposite to me when on Tuesday last I made a statement respecting what the Government had done and said in this matter, and that that statement was not in any one single particular challenged or controverted. I should be glad to know this: On what authority has Lord Cranbrook said that I have changed my vote, if not my opinions, upon something which the Conservative Government has never done and never said? It appears, also, somewhat extraordinary that charges of making this a Party question should come from a Member of a Government who, in my opinion, took the first and most decisive step towards making this a Party question. These accusations come somewhat strangely from the Members of a Government who, not very long ago, convened a meeting of their own supporters notoriously in connection with this very subject. I think that now these charges have been made, we are entitled to know something of the objects for which that meeting was called. We do not know what occurred at the meeting; but we do know, if the reasons for calling it are not on the surface, that the Government had up to that time received steady and consistent support in connection with this measure from almost the whole of their Party. There was no occasion, therefore, to rally their Party together to support this Bill, unless for the purpose of obtaining that party's assent to some change in their own policy, or for the purpose of conciliating a section of their own supporters who were dissatisfied with that policy. I am told that the conduct of the Government, whatever it may have been, cannot possibly affect the merits of the question, and ought not in the least to influence the course which is to be followed by the Opposition. Now, this subject is one which we must look at from a practical point of view. It is not a mere question of what form of punishment the military authorities would most desire to see enforced and maintained in the Army. It is a question of what form of punishment it is possible to maintain, and of what, in the general interests of the Army, it is most desirable to maintain. It is a question which it has always been admitted cannot be altogether decided by mere argument in this House. It is a question which must be decided, to a great extent, by special authority; and we have always been accustomed to attribute that authority to the opinion of those who were responsible for discipline in the Army, and then to that of their Representatives in this House who are responsible to us. But we maintain that the authority in support of this punishment has been very considerably weakened, if not altogether destroyed, by the proceedings which have recently taken place. We say, that when the Government departed from the clear profession which up to that time they maintained upon this question — when they no longer took their stand upon the firm ground that this punishment was absolutely indispensable to the maintenance of discipline, and that they could not hold the military authorities responsible for the maintenance of discipline if it were done away with—that when they changed their ground, and admitted that it was a subject which was open as a whole to re-consideration, it appeared to us that they so weakened their case, as almost entirely to destroy the authority upon which this punishment had up till then been supported and had rested. Sir, in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the other day in answer to me, I observed that he did not say a single word to the effect that in the opinion of the military authorities this punishment is indispensable if the maintenance of discipline in the Army is to be maintained. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Government were responsible for the proposals that had been made. Well, we all know that the Government must necessarily be responsible for any proposal which they may submit to the House. But what the House has a right to expect is the clearest and most unmistakable expression of opinion that the military authorities can give us, through their Representatives in this House, as to what their professional opinion upon this point is; and I observed that the right hon. Gentleman, in the whole of his argument, had not one word to say as to the opinion of his military advisers upon this point. In these circumstances, the support of authority having almost entirely disappeared, the House has only to consider what are the arguments for and against this punishment. They have been so frequently repeated in this House, that it is quite unnecessary that I should go over them again. I will say this, however—that they seem, by the debates which have occurred, to be reduced in reality to one contention, which may be shortly and concisely expressed by the words “the bullet or the lash.” If this is really the only argument raised by hon. Gentlemen opposite, if they really think that the alternative is between the infliction of the penalty of death and that of the lash, then I cannot but think that the suggestion which I made the other day was one which would have gone very far towards meeting this argument. The offer which I made to the Government was that they should continue the use of the lash, but only in those cases in which, as they say, the use of the bullet would be rendered indispensable by the discontinuance of the lash. I, at the same time, asked that Parliament should receive some security that the lash should henceforth only be used as the alternative to that punishment which the Government said would have to be inflicted so frequently if the lash were done away with. But it is now clear, from the attitude which has been assumed by the Government, that in their opinion, and in the opinion of military Members of this House, it is necessary to retain this punishment in a very large number of cases, in which it would be idle to say that the alternative would be the penalty of death. As to this, I have reason to believe that there is a very great difference of opinion among military men themselves. Reference was made, the other day, to the opinions expressed upon this question by certain military journals. I believe some of them express the opinion of a very considerable number of military men, and especially of the younger officers of the Army. These latter, it is true, are not the most directly responsible for the maintenance of discipline, but they are the men upon whom will devolve the maintenance of discipline in our Army in the future, and I cannot but think that their opinions are entitled to a considerable quantity of weight. Well, I believe that it is the undoubted opinion of a great many distinguished officers that the retention of this punishment, at the stage which is now reached, after the discussions which have been held, the attention which has been directed to the question, and the adverse expression of opinion which it has received from the country, would, at all events, for a very large number of the offences named in the Schedule, be more injurious than beneficial to the interests of the Army. I now wish to refer to another charge which has been brought against me in reference to my conduct in connection with the question before the House. It has been said—it was insinuated by Lord Cranbrook in his speech last night—that the course of conduct which I have followed has been dictated to me by the exigencies of the Party with which I am connected. I think, however, that the mere statement of dates which I made the other day ought to be sufficient to refute this charge. I stated to the House the other day—and I trust that the statement which I then deliberately made, and which I now as deliberately repeat, will carry conviction to the House without corroboration, though, if necessary, my statement can be corroborated—I stated that the decision at which we had arrived was one which was come to before any of these difficulties of Party arose to which reference has been made. I hold that, in the circumstances which then existed, it was necessary that I and my Friends should come to some decision upon this question. What was our position? We were informed that the Government were re-considering this question as a whole, and were in consultation with their Friends as to the course to be adopted. We did not know what their decision might be, or what was the nature of the communication they would address to the House on Monday afternoon; but we did know that a great many Gentlemen on both sides of the House anticipated that it would take the form of an announcement that the Government had reason to abandon the lash altogether. If that announcement had been made, no one would have thought that it was the duty of the Opposition to uphold the continuation of corporal punishment against the decision of the Government. On the other hand, the decision might be, as it turned out to be, a decision to maintain corporal punishment, without any very considerable limitations, as compared with those with which it was originally introduced. Surely, then, it was the duty of Members of the Opposition to consider what their course should be in either event, without being guided by Party motives. We, therefore, did take the question into consideration, and the arguments which had induced the Government to reconsider it; and we determined that, whatever the decision of the Government might be, we could not support the continuation of this penalty any longer, except in the circumstances to which I have referred. In these circumstances, we formed the opinion which I announced the other day; and a mere statement of the facts shows that that decision was arrived at calmly, deliberately, and sincerely, and entirely without reference to any of those Party exigencies to which reference has been made. The course which I now propose will, I think, be the most convenient in every respect to the House; and I, therefore, beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name upon the Paper.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no Bill for the Discipline and Regulation of the Army will be satisfactory to this House which provides for the retention of corporal punishment for Military offences,"—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

—instead thereof.

COLONEL STANLEY : Sir, the noble Lord, at the beginning of his remarks, said it would perhaps be as well that he should explain the reasons for the course which he was taking, and in that respect, I think, many of us will have agreed with the noble Lord. But, for my own part, after seeing the terms of his Notice, and after naturally enough anticipating the arguments by which the noble Lord would advance his proposition, I must confess I was somewhat surprised to find that the remarks of the noble Lord should have partaken rather of the character of a personal explanation than of a speech with regard to the merits of the question. The noble Lord thought it was incumbent upon him to explain the course which he adopted a day or two ago in recommending the clause which then stood in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), and to state the reasons which induced him to recommend that a preamble should be attached to that clause. But I cannot help feeling—although I do not say he wished to evade the question—that the noble Lord spoke with a certain sense of relief when he departed from that which is the actual proposition before the Committee and turned round to speeches which had been delivered in other places, and made remarks on the tone and character of those speeches. The noble Lord complains of words which have been used elsewhere by my noble Friend Lord Cranbrook. Those words were, I believe, substantially to the effect that the noble Lord had come down and had changed his vote, and had possibly also changed his opinion. [The Marquess of HARTINGTON: If not his opinions?] Well, "if not his opinions;" I beg the noble Lord's pardon. If, however, my noble Friend had said that the noble Lord had changed his opinion, I should have thought it was not an unnatural remark to make, inasmuch as my noble Friend Lord Cranbrook succeeded, though at some interval, the noble Lord in the conduct of the Office of which I have the honour to fill; and I have no doubt that my noble Friend has a perfect recollection that during the noble Lord's tenure of that Office no effort was made by the noble Lord in the direction which he now advocates. I wish especially to touch upon a point which, in terms which could not be mistaken, the noble Lord referred to the manner in which we are accustomed, in these matters of discipline and in technical matters, to look at what he was pleased to call "authority," and the remarks he made were such as to lead the House to suppose that the military authorities, with whom it is my duty to act, were either indifferent to this question, or had expressed themselves to the effect that they were opposed to the views which I myself had advocated. I have never liked, on my own part, in any way to speak except upon the responsibility which I have the honour to fulfil towards the House and the country; but as it has been my duty to hear reports of this kind which have been industriously circulated, not by the noble Lord, but by those whom the noble Lord calls—somewhat rashly, I think—his Friends, I beg leave to give a distinct and categorical denial to the assertion that any language ever held by me, or any statement made by me in this House is, so far as I am aware, impugned by the military authorities with whom I act. Then the noble Lord accounted for the somewhat sudden movement which had occurred. He said that as long as the question was not open at all there were very good reasons for not opening it; but that the moment the Government departed from their position there was no firm ground on which this question could rest. Upon that I shall have a word to say by-and-bye; but I stated to the Committee the other day, and I repeat it now, that we do consider the proposition which we have placed before the House to be a firm basis on which the question is to be based. The noble Lord commented on portions of the speech of my right hon. Friend near me who spoke of re-opening the question as a whole. That is a matter which I thought I had pretty well explained on a previous occasion, and I will not now take up the time of the House by referring to it; but I will leave my right hon. Friend to answer for himself, as I ventured to answer the other day for him. Let us pass from those matters, which, after all, are only of ephemeral interest, to that which is the real point of the matter under discussion. Now, I will venture to say that in no previous set of discussions have so many loose statements and haphazard arguments been advanced as have been used with regard to this Bill; and, therefore, it is almost with a feeling of comfort that I can turn to a speech in which there really seems to be an appreciation of the circumstances in which the country is placed, and of the circumstances which have induced the Government to adopt the line they now recommend. Contrasts have been drawn all through with foreign Armies, and I thought the hon. Gentleman the Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) distinguished himself by going to the root of the matter in the very brief, but pregnant, remarks which he addressed to the House within the last few days. Constant comparisons have been made with foreign Armies; and it has been said that the German Army and the French Army, for example, get on without this punishment. I speak under every sense of responsibility; but I have no hesitation in saying, without fear of challenge, that if we were placed in the same circumstances and under the same conditions of service as the German Army, we could, without hesitation, adopt the same or similar means of discipline which they find it necessary to use. The conditions, however, are not the same. In recent wars the German Army have never operated in an uncivilized country, or thousands of miles away from its base. The German Army has operated, even when within a foreign country, in one in which there were many conditions in respect of the retention and restraint of prisoners that do not apply to the countries and the climates in which we operate. I do not wish to press the argument too much; but I find in the German Staatsgesetzbuch frequent allusion to the Ortsgefängnis, or local prison; and, if I read the context aright, it is not unusual to use the means of restraint in prisons, even when the Army finds itself in an enemy's country. Of course, no such means are open to us. I will pass, however, to the argument adduced by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Berkshire, that it is mainly the character of the men to which we should look—a proposition in which I entirely agree with him. But let us understand that we are not dealing with a state of things such as we could wish to exist, but with things as we find them. Speaking briefly, there appear to be three alternatives in the arguments of the hon. Member for Berkshire. One is the argument he raises as to the desirability of having a smaller number of picked men with better pay. I quite agree that if you are to get absolute command—as you may require to have at times—of the labour market, you must give an amount of pay not only equal to, but probably in excess of, that which is given in civil life. Men, when they come forward to make these kind of bargains, are sensible enough to know the nature of the engagement they are making; and a skilled artizan, or any other person in a similar position, would clearly understand the value of his labour if it were transferred from one climate to another, and he would, therefore, expect not only a fair day's pay, but something in excess of it. It must be borne in mind, too, that however much skill makes up for numbers in civil work, yet in war the gros bataillons must have their effect, and the mitrailleuses make no discrimination of persons. Then, again, there comes the alternative, which has never recommended itself up to the present time, though I have heard expressions contrary to it used in this debate—I mean the alternative of conscription in some form or other. Assuming that you have a conscription, as Germany and other countries have, you force men into the Army from all classes of society. You either expel the disorderly element, or so soften it that it can be dealt with in a different manner from what it can be in cases where it forms a larger portion of the Force. But here, again, the condition of the different countries are not the same. Well, if we do not choose to fall back upon either of these alternatives—which, after all, are a mere matter of money—you have, I think, little or nothing to fall back upon except the present system of enlistment. That being so, as long as voluntary enlistment lasts, in ordinary times, at least, it is idle to think you can tap many classes of society. There is, practically, but one stratum from which your recruits are drawn. I do not say that there are not honourable and noble exceptions; but I believe a very large number of those who enlist, whatever their good qualities in other respects, are men who have left their work or their homes either from wild habits or love of adventure, which sometimes is a weed that runs to excess, and has need of restraint. Therefore, taking into consideration what the Force you have to deal with is now, I would ask, are you not in all circumstances to be enabled to keep that Force under control?

Or are you to allow an armed force to degenerate into what it would, without discipline, inevitably become, an armed and even dangerous mob? If not, you must have discipline of some kind. That is conceded. I find no two opinions on this point, whether I search the records of foreign Armies, or ask the opinions of officers of long experience—that military punishments on active service must, in most circumstances, be summary, sharp, and decisive. Many minor offences are practically overlooked or passed by on foreign service; and, therefore, it is all the more necessary, where an offence becomes dangerous to the discipline of the Force or to the country in which you are acting, to make an example which will be sufficiently sharp to deter others from the same crimes. I do not know whether it will be necessary to argue the point to which I addressed myself the other day in reference to the military punishments now in force; but we have heard so much on this subject that I must ask pardon of the House for doing what I think needful to maintain my position. I believe it must be admitted that corporal punishment in our Army has proved, to a great extent, a most successful substitute for the punishments in use in foreign Armies. [“No!”] Hon. Gentlemen say “No,” and we are told we do not rest this matter upon solid ground. On the contrary, I say we do. We have placed in a Schedule of this Bill the offences which are liable to corporal punishment on active service. These are offences which must be dealt with seriously, and in past times they were considered sufficiently serious to have the punishment of death awarded to them. I have never said that in all cases where corporal punishment is awarded death would be awarded. That is a statement I have never made. But this I have said—that if you abolish corporal punishment you will inevitably increase both the death sentences and the infliction of death. [“No!”] An hon. Gentleman says “No.” I am not anxious to throw down an unnecessary challenge; but I do not think hon. Gentlemen will ever be successful in raising a cry against corporal punishment as a substitute for the death penalty. I think, with the exception of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) and the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), there are very few men who, if under sentence of death, and asked to take their choice between 25 lashes and death would choose the latter. So far as my experience goes, I should be inclined to believe that men would prefer that punishment which would leave them still to enjoy some portion of their lives. It is no use whatever simply to strike out this punishment and shut your eyes to the consequences. I fail to understand from the speech of the noble Lord, whether as an ex-Minister for War or in any other capacity, what he has in his mind as a substitute for this punishment—whether, when our troops are now on active service, he is going to abolish this punishment at once and trust to the chapter of accidents to maintain discipline. One word with regard to the clause of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), to which I stated my objections on Tuesday last when the noble Lord spoke on this question. I stated then that I thought it would be, first of all, an unwise measure; and, secondly, distinctly useless to oblige a court martial to pass a sentence of death when they had not in their own minds any idea that it should be executed and the sentence was only recorded that some other punishment might be inflicted. That is a state of things analogous to a condition of the civil laws which it was found expedient to get rid of. But suppose the general officer did not know that when they said one thing they meant another. He might inflict the punishment of death when the court martial intended that another punishment should be inflicted. The more I look at the matter the less I am disposed to entertain it. What is the line of conduct which the noble Lord opposite has taken to-day? I am not here in any respect to blame the noble Lord or to dispute his right to change his opinion. But one thing I wish to point out, because there appears to be a great misconception about it. I object to its being said, for purposes of argument, that any question of humanity is concerned on one side or the other. That, I think, will be pretty generally admitted. ["No!"] Does the hon. Gentleman claim a monopoly of humanity for his side of the House with regard to the infliction of the death penalty? It has been truly said corporal punishment may be barbarous. All punishments may be held to be barbarous; war is certainly barbarous. Accepting that as a general proposition, I am not concerned to follow any observations which have been made on what I should consider matters of sentiment. The real question is, is the punishment complained of necessary? Much has been said as if this punishment was prevalent in our barrack-yards and quarters. But that is not the case. It is only actually inflicted in active service or on board ship; and, therefore, let it not go forth that it is a frequent incident of the barrack-yard or of military discipline. Let that be understood. I come now, after a rather long preface, to the subject-matter of this Amendment. It is an abstract proposition. The noble Lord proposes—

I may say, for the comfort of the supporters of the noble Lord, that there is a vagueness about the terms which to some minds may be satisfactory; but to those who have to deal with this matter the proposition of the noble Lord is only intended to be, and would have the effect of being, absolutely fatal to this Bill. I want the House to be kind enough to look at what, after very protracted work, after an expenditure of time which exceeds that which the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) experienced in connection with the Ballot Bill, is now proposed. It is proposed to us that this Bill should be abandoned. ["No!"] Well, that undoubtedly would be the effect. If it is moved and carried that a Bill, which does not contain a certain Provision, is for that reason not satisfactory to the House, that, in a Parliamentary sense, undoubtedly puts the extinguisher on such a measure. Now, I do not look at this Bill in a personal light. I wish it, as far as possible, to be the Bill of the House, and not of the Government, or of any individual. In it you have passed clauses which introduce a system of free enlistment, and which do away with many of those snares that could hardly be held to be creditable to the manner in which recruiting has been carried on. You make alistment to be really in the nature of a free contract, under which those who enter into it will find themselves freer than they have been at any previous time to abrogate it, if they do not like the conditions. You have taken away, and have greatly modified, the absolute power of the provost marshal, who will only exercise his power under the control of the statute, and will carry out that which is merely the record of a summary court martial. You have introduced provisions by which men who, for an offence of a comparatively minor description, committed perhaps not without circumstances of extenuation, have been wasting their lives in prison undergoing their sentence, will be enabled, where their antecedent conduct justifies it, to be released, instead of having to fulfil the remainder of their sentence, and will, perhaps, have a chance of redeeming their character in service abroad, which has not hitherto been granted them under our military law. You have placed penal servitude in a condition coincident with that which prevails in the United Kingdom. You have materially alleviated the incidents of imprisonment in a hot climate or in India. You have placed the billeting law, which pressed unduly upon Ireland, on an entire equality with that which obtains in this country. I might mention many other minor points if time permitted; but these are some of the principal advantages which are gained by this Bill, and which I cannot help feeling will be thrown away, if the House accepts this Amendment of the noble Lord. I have said all along that I hoped this Bill would be one into which no Party considerations would enter. As far as I am concerned nothing has ever been done, I trust, except in the spirit in which the measure was introduced. And, therefore, all the more responsibility must rest upon those, if such there be, who wish to mix up Party feelings with a matter deeply affecting a great Department of the State. We have admitted Amendments—some persons have blamed us for admitting so many; but we have done our best to show, as far as in us lay, that this Bill was to be the Bill of the House and of the country. We wished to pass it with as much consent as could possibly be expected from the one side of the House and the other. Well, as I have said, in my opinion—and I only claim to speak for myself, although I believe it is also the opinion of my Colleagues—this Amendment would be absolutely fatal to the Bill. Now, what do you mean, if this course is successful, to put in the place of this measure? Do you think this is the time of the Session when you can pass a new law of Army regulation? Do you mean to leave the present law as it is, or to take an alternative course, which, as there are all kinds of opinions, may to some minds, perhaps, seem not to be impossible or inconvenient? Do you intend to disband the Army? I do not suppose that in the least. I do not suppose—although there are exceptions to every rule—that the intentions of this House are that the Army should be disbanded, or that it should ever pass in the slightest degree from the control of Parliament. But what have you in your mind? Do you intend to continue the existing law, or do you intend, as soon as possible, to put some such measure as this in operation? The noble Lord gave us, as I have said, a speech which was interesting, but which I could not but consider as rather partaking of the nature of a personal explanation than of argument against going on with the Report upon this Bill. He stated, as I understood him, that the opinion he has now expressed was in entire consonance with his opinions some time back; and that his was by no means a sudden change of opinion, because before these protracted discussions arose he had the same opinion as he now holds. Now, it is curious, but there are records which I am afraid we should all like to forget sometimes, and I find that an Amendment was proposed to “leave out corporal punishment on board ships,” and that the name of the noble Lord appears among those who opposed that Amendment. [The Marquess of HARTINGTON: What is the date?] That was on the 19th of June.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I stated frankly that I re-considered my position on this Bill exactly at the same moment as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was re-considering his.

COLONEL STANLEY: I do not know how far the noble Lord can fix the dates by that reference. [An hon. MEMBER: Saturday week.] That is the date at which the noble Lord's opinion changed. I expressed on that somewhat memorable Saturday the views which I myself and others entertained; but with regard to this matter I beg the noble Lord's pardon if I in any way mis-stated his argument. I put that, however, on one side altogether, and I will only say that no one who has seen the noble Lord's conduct in this House could doubt that he would, at this earliest opportunity, make a frank explanation of what his views are. Sir, I shall be the judge of no one's conscience. I am bound to believe, and I do believe, that the noble Lord sincerely entertains the opinions which he has advocated. I am bound also to believe that the case is the same with hon. Gentlemen opposite. But when I say this, let me say at the same time that, were it otherwise, I do not think that I could find words which would express my feelings in respect to those who could prefer—I do not say that they have preferred—the interests of Party to the interests of the country. The noble Lord, two days ago, made a statement with which I entirely agree—namely, that the discipline of the Army should be the paramount consideration. That is very well; but I hope that we are not to understand that that expression is in any way confined to the part of the House in which the noble Lord sits. I venture to think that the Amendment of the noble Lord will not be accepted; and this Bill, which I frankly say I believe to be one which, on the whole, is greatly in favour of the soldier—which I believe establishes satisfactorily that position in relation to military law that Parliament has always claimed, and, in my opinion, rightly claimed, to occupy—this Bill, which has done a good deal to clear up the hidden mysteries of military law, will, I hope and venture to predict, survive the noble Lord's Amendment. In respect to these matters, as I have said, we have been willing to go as far as we could with hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. There may have been minor points on which we have even surrendered our views to theirs. But the noble Lord must excuse me if I cannot now follow him in his present course, and if I adhere distinctly and definitely to the opinions I expressed when he last spoke on this subject. We have considered the utmost limits to which, in our opinion, in present circumstances, and in the present state of recruiting, we are able to go. We think ourselves bound to adhere to those proposals which we have made. For the purpose of discipline we believe that these proposals are based on a definite principle. We do not believe that the recruit or the soldier will not be clear-headed enough to see that those who profess to be, and who may think that they are, working legitimately in his behalf, may really be working against his interests. And, above all, we do not believe that the principles which we have advocated as those of the present Bill are such as the country will be likely to discredit. But even if it were so, if these were the last words that I have to speak in this House—and I am sure the feeling is the same with many hon. Gentlemen—I say that, putting aside any question of inclination on the one hand, or fear on the other; putting aside any feeling of sentiment, and doing that which we believe those who are most experienced in military matters are most disposed to recommend while our Forces remain on their present footing, we have done that which we conceived it to be our duty to do; and in the consciousness of having done our duty we shall, at all events, rest content. I hope it is not by any outside clamour, or by any clamour on the part of a limited section, however active they may be, that this House is to receive dictation as to its proceedings. We hope that this House may, in all these grave matters, act up to the words which are familiar to you, Sir, in our daily proceedings; and that, laying aside all Party prejudices, we may alike work for the welfare of the State.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am sure that no one can complain of the tone of the speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, or, indeed, of the tone of any speech which falls from him. To whatever subject he has occasion to refer, he invariably treats it in such a manner as to extract from it whatever bitterness or exasperation it might possibly, in the hands of others, seem to involve. And I will answer freely and at once to the amicable challenge with which he concluded his speech, that we should, as he said, in words familiar to our daily proceedings, lay aside all Party prejudices, or, if I may rely upon my own memory rather than his, I believe it is that we should separate ourselves from private interests and partial affections.

shall endeavour to follow the example of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, because I have had no share in any of the debates on this subject, and, indeed, have only considered it seriously with a view to a practical issue, after it had been so far opened, in part by proposals made from this side of the House, but still more by the proceedings of the Government as to make it the absolute and imperative duty of every independent member of the House to consider the question at large. I think it must have struck everyone who listened to the interesting speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that that speech was singularly sparing in direct argument upon the merits, either of the question of corporal punishment, or on the merits of the Amendment of my noble Friend. It was by collateral matter and issues, I think, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman strove to attain the object in which, from former experience, I believe it to be apparently possible and even probable that he may succeed—namely, in inducing the majority of the House to support the views of Her Majesty's Government. What were the main points of the speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman? He commented upon the personal position and acts of my noble Friend. Into that portion of his speech it is quite impossible for me to follow him. He referred to the great responsibility of those who say any word or do any act to establish any relation between this Bill and the interests of Party. Undoubtedly, it did appear to me that the natural construction of that argument, as far as it bears a natural construction, was not a construction favourable to the Colleagues and Party among whom he serves. Because it is, at any rate, a matter of chronology that before any proceeding connected with the organization of Party had been taken or dreamt of elsewhere, an appeal was made by Her Majesty's Government to the Party by whom they were supported, as distinct from the mass and body of the House, to support this Bill upon grounds and in connection with considerations which have not yet been made known to the body of the House. So much for that topic. There was another topic of great importance—namely, the menace—for such it was, although conveyed in the mildest terms—that this Bill, which is admitted, I believe, on all hands apart from corporal punishment, to be a very valuable Bill, must be abandoned in case the Motion of my noble Friend should be carried, and that my noble Friend must be regarded as the assassin of the Bill. As to the abandonment of the Bill, I presume we are nearly all agreed that it would be a very serious misfortune. But no dictum, even proceeding from a Secretary of State, can of itself suffice to fasten upon particular persons the responsibility of that abandonment. What is proposed by my noble Friend? He has not impugned the general character of the Bill. He has not shown either to-night, or at any other period during the discussion, any indisposition to promote it. He has assailed in the form which, I believe, is acknowledged on all hands to be the most direct and simple, and, therefore, the most convenient for us all, including the Government, a particular head of the provisions of the Bill, which is completely separate from the body of the Bill. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman says—"That Motion, if carried, will be fatal to the Bill, and you will be responsible for its destruction." In other language, he announces that so closely is the Government wedded to the proposition upon the subject of flogging that, without the maintenance of the provisions as they stand, they will not consent to confer upon the Army and upon the country the great benefits which the rest of the Bill will bring. The question on whom the responsibility of so serious a calamity would rest—we being agreed that the abandonment of the Bill would be such a calamity—is a question not to be settled by any Ministerial declaration, but by a calm and unprejudiced view of the position of the case and the public motives that ought to guide us at this moment. It is from that point of view alone that I wish to examine this matter. And how does it stand? I am not ashamed to confess that upon this question I have at all times been ruled in the main by authority. There may be Gentlemen in this House who have such a range and capacity of mind that they can form for themselves independent original judgments upon every point of the ten thousand subjects that are incessantly presented for our consideration. I certainly am not one of these, and it would be mere affectation on my part to pretend to pronounce an original opinion on the question whether corporal punishment was or was not necessary for the maintenance of discipline in the Army. I cannot arrive at the conclusion except by the aid of authority. But in order that authority may sway my mind in such a case, it is necessary that that authority should be weighty, that it should be clear, that it should deliver its utterances without doubt or hesitation. But how does this matter stand? We know that the officers of the Army are very far from unanimous. We are given to understand that among the younger officers those who have, at least, the one advantage over many of their seniors of better and more careful preparation, a belief in the inexpediency of the punishment is more widely spread, and a larger proportion are found to recommend its abolition than if the officers had given their opinion 20, 30, or 40 years ago. But, apart from the opinion of officers, which must necessarily be to some extent vague and general, what we have to look to is the language held, and the course pursued, by the Executive in dealing with this question. I must venture to remind the House of the challenge given by my noble Friend upon a former day, and the total absence of any disposition on the part of Her Majesty's Government to take up that challenge, which, if they had been in a condition to take it up, would have been the easiest matter in the world to deal with. My noble Friend mentioned certain vague and idle rumours, but rumours which were apparently supported by no small show of credibility, to the effect that Her Majesty's Government had once arrived—upon or near that memorable Saturday—at the determination that, on the whole, they would best discharge the duty to the country by abandoning corporal punishment. ["No, no!"] I am not even reiterating the existence of these rumours. I am simply reciting, as well as I can, that which was pointedly and intelligibly stated by my noble Friend two days ago, when he rose in his place and was followed by the Secretary of State. My noble Friend first referred to these rumours, and to others not less plausibly supported, to the effect that it was in consequence of the dissatisfaction of a body of their supporters, and not of considerations of military discipline, that the Government had receded from their determination. And my noble Friend invited Her Majesty's Government to meet the reports to which he referred, if they were in a condition to do so, with a simple, but intelligible and emphatic, contradiction. The Secretary of State, having heard that challenge, and having risen in his place to reply, took no notice of it whatever, but left the reports in greater darkness than before. The importance of that fact, as regards the question of authority, can hardly be denied; but it was impossible not to notice also the language used by the Secretary of State. I watched it carefully, and, although I have not the note of the words at hand, I refer to the words in which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman announced the intention of Her Majesty's Government. They were to the effect that they would adhere to the propositions in the Bill as it now stands. They felt it their duty to adhere to them; but there was not a single syllable in the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, either explicitly or indirectly, showing their belief or conviction of the necessity of retaining corporal punishment in the Army. That, I believe, is undeniably the state of the case as far as the question of authority is concerned. Now, let me turn, for a few moments, to the state of the case as regards argument. There is great utility, sometimes, in that epigrammatic form of expression by which, by means, possibly, of one monosyllable the leading ideas on a subject are put forward. In that manner, this has been said to be a question between the lash and the bullet; but that aspect of the case has been fairly denied by the frank speeches of several hon. Gentlemen opposite, and especially in that of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). The suggestion of my noble Friend has completely destroyed the idea that it is a question between the lash and the bullet. According to that suggestion, a flogging may be administered, not for a wide range of offences, infinitely various in their character, and which are now, in sweeping terms, made punishable by death; but as an alternative for death only in cases where a court martial, but for flogging, would be compelled to pronounce a sentence of death, and the Judges would be compelled to give effect to that sentence. Here is the al question at issue between the two sides of the House. I hope I have not said a word to impugn for a moment the humanity of hon. Members opposite, or to draw a comparison which must always be invidious between the humanity of one side and the other. It is not necessary for me to do so, and I confine myself to the facts of the case. If a more severe code is thought necessary by hon. Gentlemen opposite, I have no doubt that they will make a sacrifice of their private views to the public interest; but it would not be the duty of anyone not sharing their conviction of the necessity of corporal punishment to disguise the real point at issue. Let it be understood what that issue is, though it is not the question of those who are the opponents simpliciter of corporal punishment. My noble Friend says—"If you desire simply to avoid the necessity of shooting, and if you have an alternative by which you can escape it, you should distinctly state the intention of Parliament in the Preamble." In the early part of my Parliamentary career such a Preamble was by no means so rare as now, and it has ample considerations to recommend it in certain cases. Why, then, have the Government rejected that proposal? If the argument—the only one, I will venture to say, that presses on this side of the House, and the one that seems to meet with most favour on the other side—is that it is a question between the lash and the bullet, I answer that that consideration will be completely disposed of if Parliament chooses to declare that, in its judgment, the lash should not be used except when the punishment would otherwise be death. That argument might be used against those who do not concur with my noble Friend; but, as far as he is concerned, it is without point or force. However, that offer of my noble Friend has been made and declined, and the position in which we find ourselves, stated in the compass of a single sentence, is this—the Government virtually say to us—"Unless you will give us the power of inflicting corporal punishment in a number and class of cases in which, provided corporal punishment could not be inflicted, the punishment of death would not be thought of, we threaten to abandon the fruit and labour of the Session." I am now speaking of that which was most explicitly stated by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex, and it is by no means the narrow question of a few cases in which, while death is not excessive, flogging may be the preferable alternative, but it is a question ranging over a much wider field. We have been for many months engaged in a great national policy; we do not wish to rest under the reproach that our Army, resting, as it does, on the basis of voluntary service, must necessarily be inferior in character to that of other nations. We are not prepared to admit that a punishment which in itself unquestionably tends to degrade and demoralize a soldier, and which is not needful for other nations, is needful for us. We think, on the contrary, that if we wish to pursue our policy of raising the character of the Army by raising the conditions of service, we must endeavour to get rid of that punishment which, unless it is used strictly as a substitute for death, is the most likely of all the conditions of service to depress the nature and the class of the recruits in our barracks. Surely, no one can doubt the great mischief attending the infliction of this punishment. In former days it has been used with comparative indifference; and I do not suppose that most of those who argued the question 30 or 40 years ago had any adequate sense of the real and substantial objections that may be urged against it. There is the effect upon the man himself who suffers it, and I think that hardly the most sanguine of its advocates will contend that it is a punishment of a reformatory character. Then, again, there is the effect on those who inflict it; and I can scarcely conceive any form of duty from which the good men of an Army must be more averse, even in cases where it takes the place of a severer punishment. Then, too, there is the effect it has on the other comrades of the culprit. There was a time, not so very long ago, when the punishment of common thieves by the lash, if they were soldiers, was deliberately advocated by men of high character and great experience; I cannot but hope and believe that in the present day, if we contemplate the effects likely to follow our endeavours to raise the condition of our soldiers, we shall not be too sanguine in arriving at the conclusion that for offences for which death would never be inflicted we may safely dispense with the punishment of the lash. I will not dwell for more than a moment on that other very serious question, what is the actual basis, after all that has been said on the subject in this House during the present year, upon which the authority now rests in the Army? What, I would ask, is the time for which it can prudently be maintained as a punishment in the Army? Do you believe that, after all that has occurred, it can be long-lived? And if not, if you think that it can only last for a short term, do you suppose that it will be efficient for the purposes for which you desire that it should be continued? I will not dwell at length upon this, notwithstanding that I feel it to be a most pregnant and important part of the subject, because I feel that arguments like this might seem to have the character of menace, and I wish to keep the tone of the debate clear of such an imputation. I have now, and I hope without prejudice, endeavoured to lay before the House what I conceive to be the true position of the case. If ever there was a question which ought to be considered as a whole, and without reference to anything except the real interests at stake, this is that question. It is regarding it from that point of view, and that point of view alone, entirely apart from the prejudices or bitterness of Party, that I, for one, have arrived at the conclusion that the course which my noble Friend asks us to take is a wise course, and looking at the position in which the question now stands, owing to the acts of the Government, I cheerfully accept the alternative which they offer to us, and shall record my vote in support of the Amendment.

VISCOUNT SANDON: We must now feel thoroughly re-assured, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, that no question whatever of humanity is at stake between those who sit on the two sides of the House. The point of view from which the Government look at the matter is, honestly and truly, that of humanity. From that point of view, the Government consider it to be a most serious question; for we have not only to take into account the suffering which may be inflicted on an individual soldier, but the dangers which may surround our Army in the field, as well as those to which the unoffending population among whom it may have to move may be exposed, and the risk to the policy in support of which war may have become necessary. And now I should like to know how the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman can explain their sudden conversion in this matter. The change was made only last Saturday week, and it has been made, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down says, simply because he and those who act with them found they were supported by authority in the view which they now take. But what was the authority which the right hon. Gentleman cited? Successive Liberal Governments have been in favour of maintaining flogging as a punishment in the Army. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) was a Member of a Government for years, during whose tenure of Office flogging in the Army might be inflicted to the extent of 50 lashes. The right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues must have believed that it was a punishment which was necessary for the purpose of maintaining discipline among the troops in the field, otherwise they would not have been justified in permitting it to be resorted to. But what, I repeat, is the authority on which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich relies? The first authority he gave us was that of younger officers of the Army; but he did not quote the name of a single officer as being in favour of the abolition of flogging. This reminds me of a somewhat similar assertion which was made by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), who said that only one or two soldiers had been shot in the German Army during the campaigns against Austria and France. Now, that, I cannot help thinking, is one of those wanton assertions which we occasionally hear made in this House.

MR. MUNDELLA: That assertion is confirmed by a letter which appears in the newspapers this morning. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is not now in Order. He will have another opportunity of explaining.

VISCOUNT SANDON: I cannot help thinking that, when assertions of the kind are made, the authority on which they are founded should also be given; and it would, it seems to me, require some very good authority to establish the truth of that which the hon. Gentleman has stated. But to go back to the authorities cited by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. Besides the younger officers of the Army, whom he did not name one—although when he was talking about officers he might have referred to the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), who honestly told the House that if flogging were abolished he did not know how discipline in the Army was to be maintained—the right hon. Gentleman's other great authority was Her Majesty's Government, who, it had been rumoured, he said, intended at one time to abolish flogging altogether. I am, however, in a position to say that that rumour is absolutely and entirely untrue. I have never heard the subject once mentioned, and the Government never entertained an idea of giving up flogging in the field. It is very strange that these rumours should be advanced as an authority on a great question. So far as I could make out, those two were the only authorities cited by the right hon. Gentleman; but what is the argument of the noble Lord who sits beside him? He says that he entirely agreed with those who thought it was necessary to retain the power of inflicting the punishment of flogging in the field; but that the changes which had been made during the progress of the Bill through Committee had completely upset his calculations on the subject. But what were those changes? The Government consented to the reduction of the number of lashes from 50 to 25, when they found that the military authorities were of opinion that the maintenance of discipline would not, in consequence, be endangered, and some alteration was made with reference to the powers to be intrusted to the provost marshal. It would appear, however, that if we had retained the punishment of flogging for all those trivial offences for which it might have been inflicted before under a Liberal Government, the noble Lord would have continued to oppose its abolition, true to the past of himself and his Friends. But because we take the terrible step of doing away with flogging, except for those grave offences which are punishable with death, the noble Lord came down to the House on Saturday week, prepared to reverse the position which he maintained this year and which has been maintained for years past by successive Governments. I do not know whether this change may properly be described as a Party manoeuvre; but it has the appearance of being something of the kind. I would point out to the House that the question before us is one on which it is not only military men who are competent to decide. It is a question which deeply affects the interests of our country, for everything which relates to the honour and efficiency of the Army touches every Englishman to the quick. I think I must confess that we have rather muddled up the subject. Owing to the long discussions which we have had upon it, I should not be surprised if, in many quarters, it came to be thought that we were now, when we are at peace, about to introduce the system of flogging into the Army for the first time. The Amendment of the noble Lord has, no doubt, been carefully worded; but there is not one word in it which would lead one to suppose that flogging was to be resorted to only when the troops were in active service. As I have said, an impression appears to prevail, in some quarters, that a Conservative Government are establishing flogging for all military offences; whereas the fact is that we are continuing a Code which has been adopted by previous Governments for many years, and that in the course of our proceedings we have been able considerably to modify it. And what, let me ask, does active service mean? It is, after all, but a mere euphemism for the horrible realities of war. You have your Army here in England looking as mild and well-mannered as possible; but various circumstances from time to time arise, which compel you to throw it upon a foreign and, perhaps, a barbarous shore. Why have you to do so? Because of the extraordinary enterprise of your commerce. You establish settlements which, at last, draw you into complications, and oblige you to send out your troops to defend them. Look at the immense importance of maintaining discipline in the Army in such circumstances for the sake of the men themselves. You say that taking a fowl or anything of that kind is a small matter in one of those parts; but do you not think that, in the interest of your men alone who fight your battles, it is of enormous importance that the feeling of the population should not be turned against them—that guerilla warfare should not be occasioned? And what does guerilla warfare mean, but that your men might be shot down as they go along? One of the great objects of a civilized country is to prevent the feeling of a whole population being turned against you. Is it not your interest that when your Army is leaving a country which it has entered it should leave the population of that country as friends instead of foes? Can you imagine that after terrible conflicts, after hand-to-hand encounters, after seeing comrades cut down by his side, an English lad from the plough, from the mine, from the workshop, or the loom, is at all so gentle a creature as he is at home? Your Army, after an encounter in the field, might become something like demons, unless they were under control. I venture to say that, on the ground of humanity, it is necessary that there should be a power of inflicting a sharp and severe punishment. The only way in which we can prevent troops being embarrassed by guerillas, and the population being subject to the most fearful outrages, is by having a system of short, but sharp punishment where the troops are actually engaged in war. That being the case, what is the punishment to be inflicted? All experience shows that you cannot imprison in the field; I do not believe in torturing a man by tying him to a tree; I do not believe that Englishmen would tolerate the French system. What resource, then, have you? You have the resource of shooting, or of inflicting corporal punishment, such as it is now proposed to maintain. If I look at the question from a humanitarian point of view, or have regard to the authority of military men of the past, I have no choice in this matter. I, for one, would be no party to the change that is suggested, of giving power to our officers to order our soldiers to be shot for breaches of discipline in the field. I decline entirely to take upon my head the blood of the English soldiers who will be shot if this milder form of punishment is done away with. I believe that if, in a moment of Party excitement, you took away the existing power of inflicting corporal punishment, you would be sowing the seeds of one of the most terrible of all calamities—an undisciplined Army in the field; for the military commanders, though they found they could not use the lash, would, for a time, not dare to use the bullet. Holding these views, I decline to take the responsibility of increasing the number of our soldiers who will be shot in the field by the hands of their brethren. I beg to express my own personal feeling in opposition to the Motion of the noble Lord. I do so on the ground of humanity, for the sake of the inhabitants of those countries in which our soldiers may hereafter unfortunately be engaged; I do so for the sake of our soldiers, and for the sake of the military honour of this great country.

MR. MUNDELLA said, the noble Lord who had just spoken characterized a statement which he made the other night as a wanton statement. [An hon. MEMBER: Wandering.] He understood the word used was wanton. He accepted it either way. The noble Lord was always put up by the Government when there was a question of humanity under discussion; but there was no Member in that House who was so vituperative to the extent of his limited capacity as the noble Lord. He had once before to apply to the noble Lord the lines of Byron—

That ever scuttled ship, or cut a throat.”

The noble Lord got up with an appearance of fairness; but he managed to insert as much venom, to convey as many innuendoes, and to impute as many bad motives in his speech as any man who got up in that House. He (Mr. Mundella) begged to say that the statement which the noble Lord declared to be absolutely untrue was made upon the authority of a British officer of great distinction. To day there appeared in The Times a letter signed by a soldier—Captain Hozier—who said he was attached to the German Army during the Austrian and French campaigns, and that while no corporal punishment was inflicted upon the men of that Army, not a single soldier was shot in either of those campaigns for breach of discipline. Captain Hozier further stated that during the last 25 years not a man had been shot in the Austrian Army. Why did not the Secretary of State for War contradict these statements if they were not true? His (Mr. Mundella's) statement was made on Tuesday. The Secretary of State for War had access to official information, and he knew whether that statement was true or not. If it was not true, why did not he say so? Because he knew better. The noble Lord the Member for Liverpool said that as our troops went to barbarous countries it was necessary for the maintenance of discipline to retain the power of inflicting corporal punishment on our soldiers. Were there no prisons in South Africa? Were there no prisons in India? What did it come to? That flogging was to be maintained for the sake of Afghanistan and Zululand. Was there ever such a hypocritical pretence as that? ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The expression which the hon. Gentleman has just used is not Parliamentary.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he at once withdrew any term which the right hon. Gentleman said was un-Parliamentary. But he maintained that the statement would not bear examination for a moment, that it was necessary to maintain flogging in order that the Natives of the country which we invaded might not suffer at the hands of our soldiers. Two distinguished officers, yesterday, said to him that it was a mistake to maintain flogging; and they hoped he would use his influence, if he had any, to get flogging abolished. He would not betray their confidence by giving their names. He was satisfied, if flogging were abolished—and it was very nearly abolished—we should have a better Army, and those who now fought for the maintenance of the lash would look back on their action with regret, if not with shame.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down complained of the vituperation of the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon); but the noble Lord had the advantage, inasmuch as he had not, like the hon. Member for Sheffield, been called to Order by the Chair. If he had had any doubt as to this question of flogging having been taken up by the Leaders of the Opposition as a Party question, that doubt had been removed by the speeches of the right hon. Member for Greenwich and the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs. The supporters of the Government were placed in this matter at a disadvantage, because the unreflecting portion—which he regretted to say comprised a very large portion—of the public would arrive at the conclusion that Members who sat on this side of the House were the promoters of flogging in the Army, while those who sat on the Opposition side were the mild, gentle, humanitarian Liberals who wished to abolish the lash. He did not think that was a fair view, and he trusted the public, after the debate, would see that there was just as much humane feeling and good wishes for the welfare of the Army on the one side of the House as on the other. What were the facts as to flogging? The lash was only maintained when this country was in a state of war with another country, and on board ship under the flag. The public scarcely contemplated this fact? Why was flogging kept up at all in the Army? Because officers commanding regiments declared that, unless this punishment was maintained, it was impossible to keep up discipline before the enemy. No substitute for the lash had been suggested unless, indeed, it was the bullet. With regard to the severity of the punishment itself, he was bound to say, having served abroad in the old days, when flogging was much more common than in recent years, he had seen the most harrowing and painful sights in India. The scene was to many persons more painful, mentally, than it was to the men who physically received the punishment. He was of opinion that 25 lashes given by a boy was, under all the circumstances, not excessive. As to the infliction of the lashes by the drummer boy, in his eyes, this was one of the most degrading parts of the business; to see a boy of 12 years flogging a man old enough to be his father. He should be glad to see an alteration in the law in that respect. As to the comparison made between the English Army and the French and German Armies, he held that it was absurd. Our Army was recruited from the lowest ranks of the population, including men direct from prison, who were admitted by some recruiting sergeants; but the French and German Armies included gentlemen's sons and tradesmen and artizans, and they, by their superior feeling and better education, kept in order the unruly members. Again, on the Continent, no great difficulty was experienced in sending an offender to a military prison from the front; but how was that to be done in Zululand or in Burmah, China, or India, where most of our wars were carried on? How could they, for instance, send men back from Blood River to a Natal prison? An officer had told him that he disapproved of flogging, and that when his men did wrong he tied them together and made them drag a gun all day; but it seemed to him (Mr. Benett-Stanford) that that was not so humane a punishment as flogging. He hoped the Government would abide by their Bill and by their determination; but he suggested that the Royal Commission about to sit on the affairs of the Army should take the question of flogging into its consideration, and when the question arose again the Government could act on the decision come to by the Commission. What he might call the sudden conversion of the Leaders of the Liberal Party in regard to this question certainly struck him as being somewhat strange. During the time they were in Office, those Gentlemen asked Parliament, year after year, to pass the Mutiny Bill, instead of doing which they could have proposed the abolition of flogging, which they did not do, but for which they now seemed to be so particularly desirous. He could not help thinking that the Liberal Leaders were now disregarding their public duties, in order to get up a sentimental cry in view of the coming General Election.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, there could be no doubt that the days of flogging as a means of punishment in the Army were drawing to a close. The abolition might not come this year or next; but it must come in the end. He should, therefore, support the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs, but upon grounds different from those which the noble Lord had stated. He (Sir Henry Havelock) acknowledged that he had been a supporter of corporal punishment in certain circumstances in the Army; but he had come to the conclusion that it must be done away with in consequence of the course taken by the Secretary of State for War. By that course some of the offences for which, in former days, the lash was the punishment had been removed from the Schedule. He alluded principally to offences which were the result of drinking, a habit to which English soldiers were, perhaps, more prone than the soldiers of any other European country. He was, therefore, of opinion that flogging was the readiest, and perhaps the most appropriate, punishment that could be inflicted for drunkenness and the crimes which resulted from this inherent vice of the British Army; but the Secretary of State for War, by the changes he had made in this Bill, had deprived him of this plea for its maintenance, and he should support the proposition of the noble Lord. What, he would ask, would be the effect of the alteration made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman? They were now engaged in a war in Zululand, and he understood there was considerable disorganization in the Army there; but he had no hesitation in saying that when this new law reached the Cape its contents would speedily be known throughout the length and breadth of the Army, and that one of the consequences would be that the present disorganization would be increased by a corresponding increase in the cases of drunkenness and the offences which arose out of it. It was said that corporal punishment was brutalizing; but this he denied. He admitted that flogging was deliberate, systematic, graduated torture. It was brutal, but not brutalizing. Those of them who had been flogged at school, and soundly flogged, did not feel that the punishment was either brutalizing or degrading. In the Army it had been an efficient punishment for the maintenance of a very high degree of discipline; but he believed those who had suffered the punishment had not felt degraded. It had acted as a sound, wholesome deterrent on those who had witnessed its infliction; but the soldier who had been punished often felt it as an additional spur and incitement to distinguish himself. He belonged, in fact, to a class of men who were strong, fierce, irregular, and adventurous in their nature, and that was the class which had done so much to make an Army realize the saying that they never knew when they were beaten. He should be very sorry to see this class eliminated from the Army, and its place supplied by the school-board-bred milksop. In the French Army the system of discipline was neither superior nor more humane than ours. It had two alternative phases—great laxity, and a sharp re-action to extreme and horrible cruelty. In time of peace, men were shot in garrison for breaches of discipline; and in the field laxity, which would not be tolerated for a moment in this country, was met by the frequent—he might say constant—infliction of death. The Russian peasant or soldier, when drunk, would lie down and go to sleep; if demonstrative, he would slabber his friend or comrade; but he had not the element of violence within, and, therefore, it was not necessary to check violence by punishment in the Russian Army. The German Army was composed, in the main, of highly-educated men, and, therefore, maintained a superior social tone; and if we had an equal proportion of good men in our Army, we should have no necessity for the lash or for death. Indeed, they would not be necessary if our Volunteers were called out, because the moral sense and respectability of the great majority would overpower any inclination on the part of the ill-conditioned to commit any offences calling for severe punishment. But in the German Army deliberate torture was not unknown. It was not an unfrequent thing for a man to be tied, for 12 or 14 hours, in a cramped position, to the wheel of a gun-carriage. In time of peace it had been the practice to subject men to torture for minor offences. A man would be put alone into a cell, without table or chair, and with a floor of blunt-edged laths, which caused some pain to the feet; and the torture thus inflicted was worse than a small modicum of corporal punishment. Torture was habitual in the Volunteer Army of the United States, particularly out in the far West, where public opinion was weak. The progress of public opinion in this country was now due mainly to the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood)—a sentimental humanitarian, whose motives he respected more than his knowledge. Personal experience had convinced him that our Code of military punishments, though in some senses brutal, [was, at all events, more just, more equal, and more humane than the practices resorted to in foreign Armies. From 28 years' service he claimed to know the feeling of the British soldier. He recollected 13 instances in which corporal punishment had been inflicted, and there was not one in which it was not necessary, and in which the sufferer would not have admitted that it was deserved. He was stung to the quick by one remark of the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), who said that he spoke strongly, and that if he had been a soldier he would have spoken still stronger. That simply meant that the soldiers in the House were brutalized by familiarity with a degrading punishment, and that they could not see the matter from his exalted standpoint. This was an unnecessary sneer against men as humane as the right hon. Gentleman himself. The only instance he had seen of a man being humiliated and degraded after the punishment was that of a man who proved himself a coward. He said in bravado, and in the hearing of his comrades, that the punishment had not caused him any inconvenience, and that he could take another standing on his head; but when the officer commanded silence on pain of a drumhead court martial and a repetition of the flogging he was cowed, and went away a degraded man, lowered in the opinion of his comrades, who saw that he was really afraid of another flogging. But, generally, there was no feeling of degradation in the individual sufferer, who often re-established himself in the good opinion of his comrades and officers by exemplary and sometimes heroic conduct. He supported the Amendment; but he did so on an entirely different ground from that taken up by the noble Lord. While the number of lashes was maintained at 50, and flogging was applied to a large number of intermediate offences against discipline—offences neither very grave nor very trivial—the punishment was an effective one; but the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, by his concessions, had entirely cut the ground from under his own feet. Flogging as limited by the Bill could not, in his opinion, be defended. The only excuse for it—namely, that it could be resorted to when imprisonment was impossible and death too severe—was gone. If he was not mistaken, some other form of punishment would have to be devised to replace it, and that speedily.

Mr. J. R. YORKE said, they had listened that evening to several personal explanations, particularly to one from the Leader of the Opposition—an explanation which was properly characterized by the Secretary for War; but no explanation they had heard was more remarkable than that which was offered by the hon. and gallant Member who preceded him. It seemed as if he were about to be the isolated instance of an hon. Member sitting on the other side of the House who was prepared to vote with Her Majesty's Government. But as the discourse of the hon. and gallant Member proceeded, it became a most bewildering one. The hon. and gallant Member traversed the greater portion of the earth's surface. He took the House through France, Russia, Germany, and America, and appeared to regret the absence in all those countries of flogging as it was administered in the British Army. In fact, the hon. and gallant Member seemed to have risen for the purpose of delivering the funeral oration of corporal punishment, and in accordance with the usual practice on such occasions—de mortuis nil nisi bonum—he pronounced a warm panegyric on the practice of flogging in the Army. In fact, the hon. and gallant Member seemed to say—"Take it for all in all, we ne'er shall look upon its like again;" and appeared to come to the conclusion that, after all, he ought to support the system of flogging. Finally, however, the hon. and gallant Member concluded by saying that, owing to the peculiar conduct pursued by the Government, and in spite of all the acknowledged merits of flogging as a system, in spite, too, of its superiority to the systems of punishment which prevailed in all other Armies, he felt compelled to vote against Her Majesty's Government. And what reason was advanced by the hon. and gallant Member for that extraordinary conclusion? So far as he could understand from the bewildering oration of the hon. and gallant Member, there appeared to be two reasons. The first was that the Government had abandoned flogging as a punishment for drunkenness. If flogging were worth retaining at all, it ought to be retained in respect of that crime. The hon. and gallant Member appeared to think that in time of war, and especially in Zululand, there was scarcely any temptation likely to fall in the way of the soldier save that of indulging in too much drink, the inference being that if flogging for drunk-ness were retained the hon. and gallant Member would vote for the Bill as it stood. The punishment, the hon. and gallant Gentleman said, was not a brutalizing one, it rather incited to deeds of valour, as men who had undergone it would show their fellows the way, if the chance of doing so should occur, of gaining special distinction. But the other reason assigned by the hon. and gallant Member for voting against Her Majesty's Government was a still more remarkable one—it was this, that so long as the number of 50 lashes was retained he would never hear of flogging being dispensed with. The hon. and gallant Member did not say whether the exact number of 50 ought to have been retained, or whether 50 stripes save one, or 40 stripes save one, would suit his views; but because 50 had been reduced to 25 the Government had forfeited all claim to his support. The hon. and gallant Gentleman confessed his inability to indicate any kind of substitute for corporal punishment. The French system, which appeared to consist of shooting those who under British rule would be flogged, was not, in the opinion of the hon. and gallant Member, a desirable one. The Russians when they got drunk embraced their comrades, and did not, like the British soldier, engage in assaults of a violent nature; while the Germans were of too elevated a character to be flogged. The one being too high and the other too low to be flogged, there was, therefore, no occasion to resort to the punishment of flogging in their case. It was only in the British Army, and then only in the case of 50 lashes being inflicted on the sufferer, that flogging was to be retained. Now, for his own part, he had always held that in a case of this kind the only possible course for a civilian to adopt was to take his opinion at second-hand. If he wanted a medical opinion, he would go to his doctor; if he wanted a theological opinion, he would go to a theologian; and in such a matter as the present, in the absence of special knowledge, he was compelled to fall back on the opinion of experts. Good sometimes came out of evil, and the charge against the Government of whittling away the punishment of flogging till it was no longer worth retaining might, perhaps, be a lesson to them that it was unwise to attempt government by concession. He regretted that they were have a Party fight upon the question before the House. The question was as to which ought to be settled by a few experienced heads and which ought not to be decided on humanitarian, but on purely rational grounds. The Party to which he belonged had always been consistent in this matter, and had voted through long periods of Liberal Government for the retention of flogging, even when the punishment was more severe than at the present time. The Party on the other side of the House supported the Motion of the Leader of the Opposition for different reasons. The Irish Members of the Opposition supported it because they had reason to believe that the course of conduct in which they had recently indulged was becoming increasingly odious to the people of this country, and they hoped that their opposition to the Army Discipline Bill might be thought better of if surrounded with a halo of humanitarianism. The peace-at-any-price Party opposed flogging as humanitarians, and because it was a part of their political creed that Armies were unnecessary. This Party saw that the best way to put an end to an Army would be to reduce its discipline as far as possible, and so convert it into a military mob which the country would wish to rid itself of as quickly as possible. The real difficulty of such subjects as that which was engaging the attention of the House was due to the fact that the nature of war was in itself exceptional. It was quite idle to suppose that one could argue from analogies drawn from private or social life as to the necessity or policy of the kind of punishment which should be introduced into the Army. A military punishment must be short, sharp, and deterrent. An hon. Member asked—"Why not take a soldier who should misbehave himself in the front in Zululand back to a prison in Natal?" Well, if he, being a military prisoner, were given the option of receiving 50 lashes, or of being taken across 800 miles of territory where there were persons whose kraals had recently been burnt, and who would not be inclined to treat Europeans in a very friendly manner, he should not hesitate about taking his 50 lashes, and so ending the matter. The real difficulty with regard to all secondary punishments lay in the question, "What kind of punishment is it best to adopt?" For very severe offences the penalty of death must be inflicted. Then came those offences which were not so serious as to necessitate capital punishment, but which still required a serious punishment. The practice of flogging prisoners had existed for a great number of years, and the punishment had been gradually reduced from formidable to reasonable proportions; so that, while sufficiently deterrent, it could not be so severe as to necessitate the placing of a sufferer from it in a hospital. Should they give up this punishment with a light heart in obedience to humanitarian motives? They were assured by hon. Members opposite that soldiers would not in future be shot; and, therefore, if flogging were abolished, the ingenuity of commanding officers would have to be exercised in order to devise some mode of torture which should not involve the infliction of stripes, but which should be equally deterrent. Although he was sure that the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had spoken with perfect candour when he said he did not propose this Amendment in consequence of the family difference which occurred a few nights ago between him and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), and that the date of his change of opinion was antecedent to that little episode, still, it was difficult to believe that the Liberal Party would, as a whole, have arrived exactly at the present moment at the conclusion that the time had come when corporal punishment ought to be abolished, unless it was found necessary that something of that kind should be done to supply a "cry" for the next Election. For himself, he did not believe that cry would be successful. It had been tried before, and had failed. If it had not answered the purpose of the Liberal Party when flogging was more severe, it would hardly serve their turn when this punishment had been reduced to such very limited proportions. There were some humanitarians in this country who scarcely cared what happened to the soldier as long as he was not flogged; but he believed that the vast majority of the electors would hold that the Government were right in sticking to their colours, and that if any charge could properly be brought against them, it was not that they had in this matter conceded too little, but that they had been too long in making a resolute stand.

MR. HOPWOOD remarked, that this was a question on which public opinion had grown, and it had grown to such an extent that the Leader of the Opposition was now found to advocate the abolition of flogging. It was most unjust as well as ungenerous towards the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) for hon. Gentlemen opposite, whom he had so often helped in their difficulties from a remarkable spirit of fairness, now to assert or insinuate that he had changed his opinion in order to obtain a Party cry. Those who imputed that unworthy motive to the noble Lord strangely enough told them that that cry had been taken up by the Liberals before and had utterly failed. He had reason to believe that the noble Lord had resolved on his change of attitude as regards flogging, even at the time when he (Mr. Hopwood) had had the misfortune to incur his displeasure. He maintained that the Government themselves—or rather the four most prominent of its Members in the House—had had it in contemplation to do away entirely with the lash—a kind of punishment which did not exist in any Continental or American Army, and which was now exclusively reserved for the back of the British soldier only. Much had been said against the “sentimentalism” of those who opposed the use of the “cat;” but did those who talked thus understand the power, the nature of sentiment? What was the sense of honour itself—one of the most potent feelings in the human breast—but a sentiment peculiarly to be encouraged in the soldier, but most likely to make him regard flogging as painfully degrading? This punishment affected the good and the bad alike, for in arbitrary and cruel hands it menaced both, and must prevent men of character from enlisting. Every man who entered the Army was aware that, in certain circumstances, he would be liable to flogging. The argument upon which flogging was maintained as a punishment, that it was indispensable for discipline, was one, in his view, after the experience of other Armies, altogether untenable. If they said that so bad a class of men entered the Army that discipline could not be maintained without it, they were bound to show how it was that Armies based on conscription, which brought all classes of men into them, did not resort to such punishment. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had not alluded to the American Army, in which flogging was abolished in 1861. America was thronged with roughs sent to them from Europe, and her Army was formed like ours—by voluntary enlistment—and yet the abolition of flogging was attended with complete success. This question of punishment to repress offences was not new to those who studied the law of civil life and its administration. If you abolished a cruel or too severe law you always had the satisfaction of finding that the punishments left subsisting immediately acquired a new, an increased repressive value, and might each be reduced from highest to lowest without diminution of their moral effect. If this punishment were removed, there would be an immense and immediate improvement in the moral tone of the Army, and every other punishment would become more potent. Discipline, rightly understood, of course, must be maintained; but he believed if they relied less on force they would work great improvement. They were told it would be necessary to have recourse to the bullet if the lash were done away with; but in the Peninsular War the bullet had frequently to be resorted to though the lash was in full force. The proposal of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition was fair and reasonable, and would, in all probability, be carried into effect before long.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, he was not in the habit of using strong language; but he did not hesitate to denounce the noble Lord's Resolution as unjust, and, if it was a Parliamentary expression, as disingenuous, also. It was calculated and intended to fix upon the Government the odium of maintaining the punishment of flogging in all circumstances and to all time. They wished, however, to do nothing of the kind, and considered corporal punishment most undesirable, but indispensable. Unhappily, it seemed to be more than ever necessary in the present day; and hon. Members opposite would bear in mind that the condition to which the Army was reduced was the result—unintentional, no doubt, and unforeseen—of their own policy. He would be very glad when the Army recovered its old efficiency; but, in any case, it would be impossible to relinquish the punishment of flogging altogether. It was most important to retain the power to inflict it, though the necessity of doing so was much to be regretted. Our Army served in all parts of the Globe, and in circumstances that fully justified the retention of corporal punishment; while the military systems of other Powers were so essentially different from our own that no valid argument could be drawn from them. He considered that the present state of our Army strongly supported his views. In our campaigns of some years ago corporal punishment had not been lavishly inflicted. If he remembered rightly, resort had been had to it very seldom during the Indian Mutiny, and not at all during the Abyssinian campaign. The hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), however, had told them of the numerous occasions on which men had been flogged in Zululand; he could only say that such a statement furnished the strongest possible argument against the Resolution, and amounted almost to positive evidence of the deterioration within recent years of military discipline. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) had expressed himself in forcible terms as to the degradation caused by corporal punishment; but he had, apparently, ignored the degradation necessarily produced by the commission of crime. The hon. and learned Member and the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) might settle their differences by themselves; while the one desired the total abolition of corporal punishment the other might have been expected to move an Amendment involving its extension. Reference had been made to the effect which the existence of flogging in the Army had upon recruiting; but it would, he contended, have the effect of keeping out of the Army only those whom it was desirable to keep out of it. He would like to know from the noble Marquess, who had been Secretary of State for War, how he would deal with the men in the Army who were queer characters? He (Colonel Arbuthnot) could not see how, in the face of the opinions of the Commander-in-Chief, of the great mass of the non-commissioned officers, and of all the good men, bearing in mind, also, the peculiarities of our Service, the Government could consent to do away with that punishment altogether. As to the abolition of flogging being turned into an electioneering cry, as the hon. Member for Birmingham had stated, he could only say that he had no fear that he should be able to dispose of such a cry when he appeared before his constituents, as he had of others which were equally absurd.

MR. WALTER said, he could assure the House that he did not rise for the purpose of supplying any fuel whatever to those flames of Party feeling which flickered about from one side of the House to the other, and which he did not think were calculated to create that tone of seriousness with which the discussion of a question so solemn and important as that under the consideration of the House ought to be conducted. He would, he hoped, be excused for endeavouring to impress upon the House that it was not a question of Parliamentary, or of Party, but one of military discipline, and that expression meant nothing more nor less than the existence of that noble Service on which, up to the present time, the welfare and safety of this country depended. That circumstance alone, he thought, ought to carry it far beyond the reach of anything like Party triumph, or even an electioneering cry. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), who was so well known as a supporter of the abolition of flogging, had spoken on the subject with peculiar authority, but, at the same time, with a very strong bias. He had the pleasure this Session of sitting on a Committee with the hon. and learned Gentleman on the question of summary jurisdiction, and he knew the opinions which he—and he alone, he believed, of the Members of that Committee—entertained with regard to the infliction of corporal punishment, even in the mild and harmless form of the application of the birch to a naughty boy. Being aware of those opinions, he must say that he could not help feeling that the hon. and learned Gentleman's views as to flogging in the Army ought to be received with a good many grains of salt; and, with all respect for the hon. and learned Gentleman, he could not look upon him as a competent authority to influence the decision of the House on the subject. He might be allowed to make one remark by way of illustrating what he meant. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to recognize the great necessity of maintaining military discipline; but he scarcely appeared to comprehend what a serious and important thing military discipline was, when he referred to that noble Force the Volunteers as showing in what it might be made to consist. Now, no one had more admiration for the Volunteer Force than he had, or valued more highly its services. As every hon. Member whom he addressed was aware, it had turned out a great number of splendid shots, and every year it went through certain military evolutions and a certain course of drill. But no one would contend that the Volunteer Force, important as it was, and capable as it was of being made a most efficient instrument of military power, was the model to which the country ought to look for military discipline; indeed, it was impossible that the Force, as at present constituted, could understand what that discipline really was. He would quote from memory from a French, not an English, source—The History of a Conscript, a work with which many hon. Members were no doubt acquainted—a short description of what was meant on the Continent by military discipline. The interesting person who was the hero of the work stated that on his arrival in a certain town in Germany, where his regiment was to stay some months, they began to learn discipline. “Now you are not,” he went on to say, “to understand by that that we are learning how to shoot, or to do the goose step, or to perform certain other military evolutions, but discipline—that is to say, when the corporal speaks to the soldier the corporal is always right, and when the sergeant speaks to the corporal the sergeant is right, and when the captain speaks to the sergeant the captain is right, and the colonel is right when he speaks to the captain, and so on up to the Field Marshal, even though he should say two and two make five, or that the moon shines at mid-day. That is a very difficult thing for the conscript to learn; but it greatly aids my memory to see in the room written up the ‘Articles of War,’ with a notification at the end of them that any infraction of them is punishable by death or the boulet, a kind of shot-drill.” Now, a soldier had to be taught all that sort of thing, and, looking at the class of men with which we had to deal in our Army, seeing that they were men who had not the advantage of much schooling or a good early training, very severe means must frequently be resorted to to teach them discipline, and to impress the necessity of it upon their minds. The British Army was composed of a collection of units; but each unit was a portion of a great machine, the failure of any one of the parts of which would jeopardize the safety of the whole machine. Therefore, the crime of one man was multiplied 800 times, because his conduct affected his whole battalion. An offence such as the plunder of a henroost, or the robbery of a shop, which in civil life would be simple larceny, was a felony, a crime of the worst description, in a soldier, and it was on that ground that these offences were of so formidable a character. But the condition of things at which they had now arrived was, in his opinion, an unfortunate one, and he would tell them why. They were within a very small distance of coming to an agreement as to the proper mode of treating this question. He never understood his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to promise an abolition of corporal punishment, or to hold out to the House or the Committee any idea of that nature. But his right hon. Friend, undoubtedly, offered this compromise—that a certain class of offences which were at present punishable by death should hereafter be the subject of corporal punishment. How was it that, with that offer from the Government, the two Front Benches did not come to terms? He could not help thinking that if the Secretary of State for War and the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had been closeted for 10 minutes they would have settled this question. That settlement might not have been altogether agreeable to his hon. Friends behind him; but he believed it would have been satisfactory to men of business. And one thing he complained of as tending to prevent a proper understanding on this question was this—that the Paper, called a Memorandum, explanatory of the Schedule relating to corporal punishment had not been circulated with the Votes. It was with some difficulty that he got a second copy in the Vote Office. He found the Memorandum had no been distributed daily with the Amendments to the Bill, and he came to the conclusion that very few Members knew anything about it. He could not believe that if the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition and his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich had had that Paper continually before their eyes, and had known how very different an interpretation it bore from that which was popularly put upon it, they and the Government could have failed to come to an agreement. There was a notion abroad that the difference between the two Front Benches was this—that the Government had proposed that corporal punishment should be used as a substitute only for capital offences. Well, the Opposition said — “Very good; but your list of capital offences includes many offences for which, not capital punishment, but only flogging is inflicted.” Here were 26 heads of offences named in this Memorandum. He had read them very carefully, and he ventured to say that not more than six or seven of these were offences which a commanding officer in time of war would regard as not deserving of death. No. 1, a man who “shamefully abandons or delivers up any garrison, place, post, or guard, or uses any means to compel or induce any governor, commanding officer, or other person shamefully to abandon or deliver up any garrison, place, post, or guard, which it was the duty of such governor, officer, or person to defend”—death; No. 3, a man who “treacherously holds correspondence with or gives intelligence to the enemy, or treacherously or through cowardice sends a flag of truce to the enemy”—death; No. 4, a man who “assists the enemy with arms, ammunition, or supplies, or knowingly harbours or protects an enemy not being a prisoner”—death; No. 5, a man who, “having been made a prisoner of war, voluntarily serves with or voluntarily aids the enemy”—death; No. 6, a man who “knowingly does when on active service any act calculated to imperil the success of Her Majesty’s Forces or any part thereof”—death. The next three appeared to him to admit of lenient treatment. A man who “misbehaves or induces others to misbehave before the enemy;” a man who “leaves his commanding officer to go in search of plunder;” a man who, “without orders from his superior officer, leaves his guard, picquet, patrol, or post.” The next offences might be dealt with leniently, though they were very formidable. No. 10, “forces a safeguard;” No. 11, “forces or strikes a sentry;” No. 12, “impedes the provost marshal or any officer legally exercising authority under or on behalf of the provost marshal, or, when called on, refuses to assist in the execution of his duty the provost marshal or any such officer;” No. 13, “does violence to any person bringing provisions or supplies to the Forces, or commits any offence against the property or person of any inhabitant of or resident in the country in which he is serving;” No. 14, “breaks into any house or other place in search of plunder;” No. 15, “by discharging firearms, drawing swords, beating drums, making signals, using words, or by any means whatever intentionally occasions false alarms in actions, on the march, in the field, or elsewhere;” No. 16, “treacherously makes known the parole or watchword to any person not entitled to receive it; or, without good and sufficient cause, gives a parole or watchword different from what he received.” That brought him down to the 16th offence. All these were matters of death. No. 17, a man who “irregularly detains or appropriates to his own corps or detachment any provisions or supplies proceeding to the Forces, contrary to any orders issued in that respect.” That might be matter for a lenient punishment. Then came a long list of very bad offences—No. 18, “being a sentinel, commits any of the following offences—that is to say, (a) sleeps or is drunk on his post, or (b), leaves his post before he is regularly relieved;” No. 19, “causes or conspires with any other persons to cause any mutiny or sedition in any Forces belonging to Her Majesty’s Regular, Reserve, or Auxiliary Forces, or Navy;” No. 20, “endeavours to seduce any person in Her Majesty’s Regular, Reserve, or Auxiliary Forces, or Navy, from allegiance to Her Majesty, or to persuade any person in Her Majesty’s Regular, Reserve, or Auxiliary Forces, or Navy, to join in any mutiny or sedition;” No. 21, “joins in, or being present does not use his utmost endeavours to suppress, any mutiny or sedition in any Forces belonging to Her Majesty’s Regular, Reserve, or Auxiliary Forces, or Navy;” No. 22, “coming to the knowledge of any actual or intended mutiny or sedition in any Forces belonging to Her Majesty's Regular, Reserve, or Auxiliary Forces, or Navy, does not without delay inform his commanding officer of the same;" No. 23, "strikes or uses or offers any violence to his superior officer, being in the execution of his office." These offences were punished, and he maintained they ought to be punished, with death. No. 24, a man who "disobeys any lawful command given by his superior officer in the execution of his office;" No. 25, "deserts or attempts to desert Her Majesty's Service;" No. 26, "persuades, endeavours to persuade, procures, or attempts to procure any person subject to military law to desert from Her Majesty's Service." Of these, the 25th and 26th ought unquestionably to be punished with death. Of these 26 offences, all but six or seven might be punished with flogging, instead of with death. Was that a proper thing to imperil the discipline of the Army upon? These crimes must be prevented. He should like to see a request made that every Member of the House would write on a piece of paper the name of the punishment he would substitute for flogging, and place it in a box. He thought the House itself would be surprised at the marvellous want of unanimity in regard to the matter. Now, what was the proper thing to do? He would put himself in the position of a commanding officer. He would imagine a poor fellow brought before him and convicted of one of these minor offences. He would have to say to him—"My good fellow, you have been legally convicted by a court martial of an offence the punishment of which is death. You know perfectly well the serious nature of the offence you have committed. I am very sorry for your case. If I had the power of remitting the sentence, your offence should be punished with flogging; but Her Majesty's Government and the Opposition would not agree, and I have no choice but to have you shot." [Cheers.] He did not like the Amendment of the noble Lord, and could not vote for it. It must mean one of two things—either that the noble Lord objected to corporal punishment being made permanent, or that he objected to corporal punishment altogether. If the noble Lord meant either the one or the other, why did he not speak out plainly? Had the Amendment pointed, or been so amended as to point, to the temporary retention of flogging, say for a couple of years, in order that the officers might turn round and see what was to be substituted, he should have been disposed to support it. As the matter stood, however, he should not take any part in the Division; but he should endeavour to confine himself to a careful examination of the details of the Schedule, and to do the best he could to bring them into such a shape as would command the confidence of the country.

MR. OTWAY said, both the Amendment and the speech of his noble Friend were perfectly plain, and raised an issue of a very simple character. He would only retain corporal punishment as an alternative to death. This question of flogging had been so long and so much discussed that they might afford to dismiss a great many of the arguments on this occasion. Every day, however, that it was discussed it seemed to him the issue was being made more and more narrow and the result more and more certain. They had been asked not to address themselves to this question in a Party spirit. His conscience was entirely free on that point. Never from the earliest moment that he had interested himself in this question had he taken a Party view of it; but while on that side they had always addressed themselves to this question in a fair spirit they had some very severe imputations cast upon them. They were told that they were "the advocates of ruffianism in the Army" because they wished to abolish this punishment which it was said was applied to the "ruffians" and the "blackguards" of the Army. He was not prepared to say that these were proper terms for hon. Members on the Conservative Benches to use with regard to our Army—that it was composed of "ruffians" and "blackguards." [No!] Those were the terms used by hon. Members opposite. He thought the soldiers who fought at Rorke's Drift and in other parts of Zululand and in Afghanistan would repel those terms with indignation, more especially when the terms "ruffians" and "blackguards" were applied by those who called themselves the soldier's friends. The burden of proof lay with those who desired the retention of the punishment of flogging to show that discipline could not be maintained without it. This he maintained could not be done. It had been said that corporal punishment was inflicted in the German Army; but this was quite incorrect. Nothing of the kind existed in the German Army; it had long been done away with in Germany. The Secretary of State for War had stated that there was a difference between our Army and those of the Continent, inasmuch as we generally operated in barbarous countries. Well, the English Army had to operate, as it was called, in barbarous countries—in many where it had no business to be called upon to operate at all. But he contended the argument about barbarous countries told the other way. The temptations of the German Army in possession of the large and flourishing cities of France were far greater than any temptations to which the English Army operating in barbarous countries could be subjected. To the temptations of the German Army were added the recollections of the wrongs of many invasions; but it was a notorious fact that during the whole of the Franco-Prussian War only three men of the German Army were put to death for misbehaviour during the campaign. Then as to the Austrian occupation of Herzegovina and Bosnia, carried out amid a hostile population and against the ill-will of the Ottoman Forces, discipline had been maintained without corporal punishment. The American Army was strictly analogous to the British Army—in fact, there were many Englishmen in the American Army; but discipline was strictly maintained there without the lash. He remembered the time when it was said it was impossible to maintain discipline in the Navy without flogging, but now flogging was exceedingly rare in the Navy; and a few nights ago, at a large public meeting, a most distinguished officer, Admiral Glyn, who was selected to convey the Prince of Wales to India and bring him back, in reply to a question, said he was convinced flogging in the Navy should be abolished. He did not see why an English soldier should be treated with greater severity than the soldiers of every other civilized Army in the world. He suggested that camp duty of a very disagreeable and almost painful character might be given to men guilty of disorderly character instead of resorting to flogging, which had utterly failed as a deterrent. He did not share the opinion of hon. Members opposite—that the death punishment would be inflicted for minor offences if flogging were abolished. It was an injustice to require a soldier to inflict corporal punishment upon a comrade, simply because an ill-conditioned provost marshal called him to do so. Hon. Members opposite had repeatedly spoken of high military authorities supporting their views on this question; but they had never once ventured to name any of those authorities, and he defied them to name them. His own belief was, that high military authorities had long been averse to this degrading punishment, and were of opinion that the discipline of the Army would suffer far more from the knowledge which soldiers would obtain of these discussions than it would gain from the retention of flogging. He had little doubt that on the ground of this being made a Party question the Motion of the noble Lord would be defeated, and that the Ministers, who not long ago were loud in their denunciation of flogging, would carry forward to a triumph the degradation which had been inflicted upon the British Army.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, some credit was due to the hon. Member who had just addressed the House, because he had been a consistent opponent of flogging in the Army. He had no difficulty with that hon. Gentleman; but he had a difficulty to contend with in regard to the position taken up by the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich; because, while they both told the House that they had no electioneering dodges or Party purposes in view, they entirely omitted to inform the House as to what had induced them so suddenly to change their opinions. He confessed he could not account for the sudden, if not suspicious, change; and he was at such a loss to describe it that he must, therefore, coin an expression for the occasion. When a catastrophe occurred in a mine from some unknown cause, it was generally attributed to what was called "spontaneous combustion"—a term which he was totally unable to comprehend. He must, however, congratulate the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) on his great triumph.

He said this question was an admirable electioneering cry, and a very good one too. Then the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) gave a most able and convincing speech in favour of corporal punishment, and that hon. and gallant Member belonged to the spontaneous combustion Party. Therefore, they had on one side of the Gangway the electioneering cry Party, and on the other the spontaneous combustion Party. He should certainly like to hear the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich; because he, of all other men, was in the best possible position, at a time when the Army was being tinkered from end to end, to terminate that which he now characterized as an evil. Instead, however, of doing this, the right hon. Gentleman year after year came down to the House and advocated the retention of flogging, and at the present moment—a most unfortunate one, as he ventured to think, for a question of the kind to be raised—he was engaged with the Leader of the Opposition in supporting a proposal which he might have made years ago in his position as First Minister of the Crown. References had been made in the course of the debate to the military authority; and he was in a position to say, from personal conversations with the highest military authorities, that they were of opinion that it was necessary for the best interests of the Army that the punishment should be retained. What had the so-called humanitarianism done for the Army? Last year, 1,811 men were discharged from the Army for disgraceful conduct, and he had it from the best military authority that the bulk, if not the whole, of those men were still serving in the ranks; and why? Because, whilst formerly soldiers discharged with ignominy were marked with “B.C.,” and could not, therefore, re-enter the Army, now there was no mark upon them by which they could be detected as bad characters on attempting to re-enlist. This fact was the more important, because under the short-service system there had been brought into the Army a parcel of boys, and they were contaminated and vitiated by being brought into close contact with habitual criminals of the deepest dye. With regard to desertions, formerly a deserter was marked with the letter “D;” the result of the abolition of that practice was that last year there were 5,416 desertions from the Army. To bring those bad characters to the ranks was to inflict upon the well-intentioned soldier a degradation which, compared with the lash, was perfectly absurd. Within the last few minutes there had been put into his hands a letter which stated that “the bearer of this is Simpson, of your old battalion.” In 1856 he threatened to shoot his sergeant, and, having been tried and convicted of the offence, was flogged. He not only completed his then term of enlistment, but at its conclusion re-enlisted, and on his final discharge had gained five good conduct badges. He stated that from the day on which he was flogged he became a new man; and he was at that very moment in the Lobby, where any hon. Member might see him. He was earning an admirable livelihood as a civilian, and would tell hon. Members that he felt as little degraded as any hon. Member by the punishment he had undergone. Evidence could be produced to show that in many cases men in the Army had been completely reformed by the infliction of corporal punishment, and that since the adoption of the humanitarian principle to which he had referred crime in the Army had increased by 50 per cent. Notwithstanding this fact, it was said that if flogging was abolished the country would secure the services of a much superior class of soldier; but he did not think this would be the case, because men of the class could not be induced to enlist. He should like to know on what military authority and advice the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had determined to advocate the abolition of the lash. Curiously enough, both of them referred to young officers. Now, as it had been found that young soldiers were a failure, must it not be supposed that the advice of young officers was a failure too? For his own part, he would sooner seek advice from officers who had served with distinction, who had led their troops in circumstances of difficulty, and who had endeared themselves to their men. What was it that made the life of an English officer safe when he was in a barbarous country among his men? It was the fact that the men loved him and protected him, knowing that he was the real friend. We never heard of our officers being shot from behind by their own men, as was sometimes the case in foreign Armies. An English officer tried really to benefit the soldiers, and did not think he was serving them by taking up any claptrap cry that might be raised. With regard to some hon. Members opposite who made such a fuss in this matter, he would ask whether their names could be found among the lists of the supporters of those measures which had really benefited the Army and helped the soldier? It was only when a good Election cry was required that we found this immense enthusiasm. He did not know the source from which the noble Lord had taken his inspiration; but it savoured a great deal more of the Old Bailey than of the barrack-room. Just now he had mentioned an instance in which corporal punishment was proved to be a cure. On this point he would narrate an anecdote. An American found it was very cheap talk to condemn flogging, and he told his audience he would prove it. "My father," he said, "once flogged me very severely when I was telling the truth." "Wall, now," observed another American, at the end of the table, "I have knowed you since you've growed up, and it appears to me that your father has cured you." He was himself flogged when at Eton, and he knew that it did him, as an Irishman would say, "a power of good." Did hon. Gentlemen think that a soldier considered himself degraded because he was flogged? The degradation was not in the punishment, but in the crime. It was very hard that officers, who were as high-minded and as high-principled as hon. Gentlemen opposite, should be disarmed of a weapon which they used as rarely as they could. Officers took the greatest pride in their regiments, and were lauded by the Horse Guards if they could get on without corporal punishment. There was not only the natural instinct of humanity, but the desire to stand well before the authorities in the Army and the public opinion at large, which constituted a proper and sufficient guarantee that this punishment would not be abused. He maintained that hon. Gentlemen opposite were taking a grave and serious responsibility at the very time when we were told that officers at the Cape had great difficulty in controlling their men, and when crime had been more rampant than usual. Those who had the power should remember that they had also the responsibility; and he trusted they would calmly consider before, either by way of spontaneous combustion, or for an electioneering cry, they took away that which the best authorities in the Army and the most experienced military men said was a power which they wished rarely to use, which was distasteful to them to use, but which they must use on occasions of rare necessity.

MAJOR NOLAN said, with reference to the case of Simpson, which was quoted by the last speaker, that a general officer once told him a similar story of a man who accosted him in the Park, remarking, "I was with you at Gibraltar; you flogged me four times and dismissed me with ignominy from the Army, but I have always had a great respect for you." In this instance the ex-gunner got half-a-crown, and was, no doubt, well pleased with the transaction; but he did not think cases of this kind afforded a good reason for flogging the men. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell) made a reference to some observations made by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) the other night, and stated that the hon. Gentleman had adopted the course of opposing the continuance of flogging simply for electioneering purposes. He (Major Nolan) listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham, and understood him to declare that he had not used this matter as an electioneering cry, because he had always been in favour of the abolition of corporal punishment; but that by the action of the Government it would be made an electioneering cry. But the greater part of the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster was devoted to the whole general administration of our Army. He did not deal in any way satisfactorily with the question of flogging. No doubt, there were evils in enlisting men at too early an age, as he had before pointed out. That was a very important point for consideration; but it did not touch the question they had now prominently before them. There were also many evils in the Army, such as had already been referred to; but he asserted that those evils would not be remedied by the use of the lash. How did the question stand at the present stage? In going through Committee the Bill had been changed in many respects, and in none more than in this matter of flogging. Nine-tenths of the bad cases would be abolished. He acknowledged that. As the Bill was drawn, and with the Amendments of the Secretary of State for War, a man could be flogged only for the most serious crimes. But, having done so much, what was the use of retaining the punishment for a few isolated cases? In fact, there were only two cases in the Schedule for which flogging would be useful. One was sleeping on one's post. They would have to shoot a man for that if they abolished flogging. The only other case was that of gross and wilful insubordination. On the other hand, what did they lose by retaining flogging? They put the soldiers of Great Britain and Ireland in a lower position than the soldiers of any European country or the United States; and they could not put a soldier in a lower position without injuring his morale in the field. Hon. Gentlemen said that the punishment was not felt as a degradation. But it was brought home to a man as a degradation in every way, through debates in Parliament, through the newspapers, in the theatres of garrison towns, where references to flogging used to be very common—much more so than they were now. It would be brought home to a man in his native village, where he would be told that he should be flogged. In that way it injured recruiting. It was asked, "How will you remedy many petty acts of indiscipline without flogging?" But this Bill did not profess to deal with such acts, but only with the graver offences. As far as he had seen, flogging was resorted to very much to correct our own faults of administration. They flogged a dog, and as long as they flogged soldiers the latter would think they were treated as dogs. In foreign Armies it was the custom to brigade not merely battalions, but brigades and divisions in time of peace; and, consequently, when a man went into the field he found himself exactly in the same circumstances in time of war as he had been in time of peace. As a general rule men were flogged, not for disobedience to their own officers, but for disobedience to other officers into contact with whom they were occasionally thrown. Now that men were getting more civilized they resented being flogged, which they looked upon as a class distinction. And they were right. On previous occasions there was a question whether other Armies flogged or not. He drew the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the matter, and reminded him that he had got means of information which were not open to private Members; he could apply to the Military Attachés abroad, and let the House know what were the facts. But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not accept the challenge. The time had gone by for flogging, and its continuance would weaken instead of strengthen the Army.

MR. CHAPLIN trusted it would not be considered unduly intrusive on his part if he ventured to offer a few observations on this occasion. The question which was raised by the Amendment of his noble Friend was exceedingly simple; it was this. Was flogging a necessity or not for the maintenance of discipline in the Army in the field? The noble Lord told them that was a matter on which they must be guided by the highest authorities. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich also expressed the opinion that these authorities were of the widest character. What were those authorities, and what had they said on the subject? First, they had the opinion of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War, who spoke not only from his own practical military experience, and with the full responsibility of the position he occupied, but with all the advantages he derived from intimate and frequent communication with men of the highest military experience, and a full knowledge of their views on the subject. What had he told them only two nights ago? He expressed it as his deliberate opinion that the Government were absolutely compelled to retain corporal punishment for the Army in the field. That was the opinion of the Secretary of State for War—it was also the opinion of the present Administration. What was the opinion of their Predecessors in Office? He had referred to some previous discussions on the question of flogging, while his noble Friend the noble Marquess was in charge of the same Department. He found in 1864 a discussion in which his noble Friend spoke and voted on the question of flogging. On that occasion, he both spoke and voted against the abolition of flogging, and was followed into the Lobby by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. In 1865, again, the noble Marquess voted against the abolition of flogging. Again, in 1866, the question of flogging in the Army was discussed, when he found his noble Friend voted against its abolition, and was followed into the Lobby by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. Again, in 1867, the abolition of flogging in time of peace was proposed, and on that occasion his noble Friend and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, being no longer in Office, did not find it convenient to attend in their place. From that day to this they had not been called on to express any opinion on the question. He came next to the opinion of the military authorities. They were told to-night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich that all the younger officers in the Army were opposed to flogging. That was not his experience. So far as he was able to gather the opinions of officers, either young or old, they appeared almost unanimous that flogging was necessary for the maintenance of discipline. But even supposing the right hon. Gentleman was right, he placed the opinions of the young and inexperienced officers of the Army against those of the old and experienced. He had stated the views entertained on this subject by the late Administration, by the present Administration, and the great military authorities of the country; but that was not all. They had the advantage of knowing what were the opinions on this subject of those who sat on the Front Opposition Bench. The whole principle of flogging was raised on the 20th of May on an Amendment moved by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), when 239 Members voted for retaining flogging, and 56 against it. On that occasion the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) voted in the majority. That was not all, for he found that on June 17, 1879, the hon. and learned Member for Oxford expressed an opinion on the question, and said — "For his own part, he had come to the conclusion that flogging could not be dispensed with on active service."

Here, then, was a mass of concurrent opinion on the part of all the military authorities of the country, on the part of the late Administration, and on the part of the existing Administration, and on the part of the Leaders on the Front Opposition Bench in favour of the retention of flogging; and he had heard nothing during this discussion to account in the slightest degree for the extraordinary change of opinion which had taken place. What were the arguments which had been used, and who were the real Leaders of this opposition? The real Leader of the whole movement now had been the hon. and learned Member for Stockport, and the time had come for him to take a more prominent position than he occupied in his modest retirement below the Gangway. He had been followed by the junior Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), and both were respectable Members of that Assembly. He was not, however, aware that either possessed any special knowledge or experience on the question which would entitle their views to peculiar weight. Arguments they had never condescended to address to the House. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport had said he objected to flogging because it was brutal and beastly; and the hon. Member for Birmingham was scarcely less happy, for he described it as barbarous, disgraceful, and degrading to those who were flogged. [Cheers.] As hon. Gentlemen cheered, he supposed their civilization was a good deal more advanced than his own. Had these hon. Gentlemen ever heard of Eton and Harrow and of the birch-rod? When they talked of flogging as disgraceful to those who received it, they forgot that their remarks applied to probably three-fourths of the Members on both sides of the House. These were the views of the real Leaders of the opposition on this subject; and what were those of the nominal Leaders on the front Opposition Bench? He heard with surprise and the deepest regret the speech of the noble Marquess on Tuesday night. The sole reason he was able to advance in support of the extraordinary change of opinion on his part was that he had doubts in his own mind as to the views or convictions of Her Majesty's Government about the means of maintaining discipline in the Army without corporal punishment. That was the sole reason which was advanced by the noble Lord; and now that ground was completely cut from under him, because the Secretary of State for War had stated two or three times in the most clear and explicit manner that the opinion of Her Majesty's Government was that the retention of corporal punishment was absolutely necessary. That was his noble Friend's position on Tuesday night last; he was prepared to propose a Preamble by which he declared flogging must be abolished, and, at the same time, he was ready to accept a Schedule and clause by which, without the least alteration, flogging was nevertheless to be maintained. That was the position of the noble Lord up to Tuesday night last, and they were entitled to ask that night for some more distinct explanation than any they had had of this further and additional change on his part, by which he proposed to abolish flogging in the Army altogether. He desired to refrain from making any charge against one on the other side of the House. All he asked was that right hon. Members should give some distinct explanation of the change in opinion on their parts. If they did so, they would be acquitted entirely of any evil intention whatever; if they did not, in the absence of the slightest explanation, the only possible conclusion, so far as they were concerned, would be that the discipline and efficiency of the Army and the welfare of the nation might go to the dogs so long as they were able to manufacture a cry which they thought would be a fitting and a suitable cry for the hustings. The position taken up on this question was inconsistent and illogical. They had before them a Schedule containing a long list of offences to which the penalty of death had been already attached, with the consent, certainly with the silence and implied approval, of hon. Gentlemen opposite. ["No!"] But now the Government had come forward with a proposal that the penalty of flogging was also to be attached to that list of offences, not, as he understood, as an addition, but, generally speaking, as a substitute and an alternative for the extreme penalty of death. That seemed to him to be a most natural and a most humane proposition; but hon. Gentlemen opposite said—"No, nothing of the kind;" and they spoke only in the name of humanity. Flogging, they said, must be abolished, but the penalty of death should be retained. Humanity was one of the highest and noblest qualities of human nature; humanity, when it was true, when it was not used as a cloak for a purpose which must not be admitted, was a virtue beyond all price. But what did they hear that night? That we must have discipline by death for our gallant soldiers, for our fellow-countrymen serving their country. Discipline by death was the measure of the mock humanity of the hon. Members for Birmingham and Stockport. He could not help thinking there must be reasons other than those which had been avowed for this extraordinary change in the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Could it be found in the differences which were exhibited a few nights ago in the happy family on the other side of the House? The Leadership of the noble Lord was openly repudiated, and on a point of Order only; but what might he have expected if he had asserted his opinion on a question of principle in which flogging was involved? Flogging, evidently, was intended to tell upon the Elections; the hon. Member who had rebuffed his Leader went down to Birmingham—the home of the Caucus—for the natural purpose of looking after it; and now it turned out that he had set to work all his wires and all the resources of this American organization to agitate this question. It could not be said that he had been happy in the selection of a cry with which to go to the country, for what he said in effect was—"I will take care of our soldiers; I will not have them flogged, but I will have them shot." "The bullet for the Army!" was the cry with which the junior Member for Birmingham had decided to go to the country. "The bullet for the Army and the caucus for the country" was a cry which had indeed an American flavour about it with a vengeance, and he heartily wished the hon. Member joy of its reception at the hands of the people. He noble Friend had gained a high and well-earned reputation, for his task—the Leadership of the present Opposition—was indeed a delicate and a difficult one; but he trusted his noble Friend would forgive him if he told him the opinion which was widely prevalent that day, that in all his life he never played so bad a card as that which he had thrown upon the Table of the House that night, and that this manœuvre, so transparent and so clumsy—which had not even the merit of being clever, although, in the opinion of some people, possibly it might be unscrupulous—would recoil, he might be certain, with nothing but ridicule upon its authors; even if, indeed, for himself and for his Party, it did not end in disaster and disgrace.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I shall not offer the same apology for intruding upon the attention of the House as that with which the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) prefaced his speech, when he said he had taken no part in the discussion upon this Bill. I am afraid I cannot say the same; but, perhaps, not because I have taken part in the discussion upon the Bill, I should wish to say a few words upon the subject of the vote which I am about to give. I confess that the denunciations I have just heard from the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, as to the Party motives by which I and others who sit around me are actuated, fall very lightly upon me. Hon. Gentlemen, no doubt, are of opinion that throughout the whole of the discussion upon this Bill the course which I and others have taken has been governed by a desire to embarrass Her Majesty's Government. I should be perfectly prepared for those who hold that language; because I have frequently felt during the last week, whilst my noble Friend was doing all he could to support them, and fight their battle, that the leading Members of the Cabinet were denouncing him-out-of-doors. We do not look for gratitude in politics; we do not expect it; and we do not wish for it. We take the course we think proper, and from the situation which we ourselves occupy; and the course which, for my own part, I have thought it proper to take, has been to give all the loyal assistance in my power to the progress of this Bill, not only in this House, but out of this House, and to help the Government in such alterations as they might think fit to make in this measure, in order that those alterations might be made in the easiest and most effectual manner. It is very easy upon a Bill of this kind for an Opposition, wanting to embarrass the Government, to place them, over and over again, in a humiliating position. But we have not taken that course. Therefore, the denunciations of the character uttered by the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, and the tone of acrimony which I think, alone from the opposite Bench, has been introduced into this debate by the noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade (Viscount Sandon) are somewhat misplaced. The noble Lord thought fit to say of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) that he had made wanton statements in this House. Well, Sir, if the hon. Member made wanton statements with reference to the punishment by death in foreign Armies, it was perfectly within the competence of the Government, with their means of information, to have ascertained what has been the effect upon any foreign Army of the abolition of flogging with respect to the increase of punishment by death. But the Government have produced to the House no information of that character; and, therefore, I venture to say that the noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade is not entitled to treat as wanton the statements made by the hon. Member for Sheffield. This subject is, confessedly, very difficult and embarrassing; and the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, as well as others, ask why Members of former Administrations who are now disposed to support the abolition of corporal punishment did not take that course before? The first observation which I have to make is, that it is the act of the present Government which has brought the whole of our military law under review. Mutiny Act after Mutiny Act has hitherto passed unobserved and undiscussed; but it was the decision of the present Government that the whole of this subject should undergo revision, and, therefore, it was necessary that it should be carefully examined. I am bound to take some blame to myself, so far as I had anything to do with the Committee upstairs; for I was a party, with a large majority, to discourage and reject a Motion on the part of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) for taking evidence upon, and inquiring into, the subject of corporal punishment. I see now, what I did not see at the time, that it was a mistake not to do so, because I think the information obtained would have been useful when the subject—as was certain to be the case—came to be examined in this House. The question was brought up in May last, and I supported entirely the view of the Government at that time. I voted with them, and I spoke on their side, as the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire has said. The matter came on, and was largely discussed. It then began to be seen, by both sides of the House, that the existing state of things could not be supported. I say both sides of the House, because the concessions which were made by the Government, and which I took part in urging upon them, were accepted by both sides of the House, and this showed that former opinions had been changed by discussion and by the further light which had been cast upon the subject. Now, that was a very important circumstance. The noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade entirely misinterpreted the language of my noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition, when he said—"But you say if the Government had not made these concessions you would have supported them all through." That is not what my noble Friend said at all. He pointed out the fact that, from the moment at which it was admitted that the former view, which the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire has referred to this evening as being taken up by the previous Administration, could not be sustained, the whole aspect of the question had changed. That is quite obvious. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire quoted from a speech delivered by my noble Friend in 1864; but he knows very well that at that time the Government opposed doing away with corporal punishment in time of peace. The punishment, however, was done away with in time of peace, in spite of the Government and the military authorities; and does any man say that evil has come from this? What was the first thing which happened during the progress of this discussion? A great change was made. A Schedule was promised, which was, in effect, to reduce very largely the number of offences to which corporal punishment was applicable, and the magnitude of the punishment was also reduced. That showed that the Government and the military authorities were not sure of their ground. I do not blame them for taking that course; but when they agreed largely to diminish the number of offences and lashes it showed that the information upon which they had hitherto acted was insufficient. These concessions being made, what happened next? For my own part, I was willing and ready to support the Government in the concessions which they then made, and in the position which they then took up. But were the Government satisfied with the appearance which the question had assumed? From circumstances over which I had no control, I was unable to be present in this House on Saturday week, and I can, therefore, only speak from the information which I have received through the ordinary channels; but upon that Saturday the Government, who had days before promised a Schedule, and a reduction in the number of lashes, came forward and stated that the question was about to assume a new aspect. Without going into the question of what the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said, or was supposed to have said, I may mention that this has been variously interpreted; and that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) and the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), although they may have been mistaken, both understood him, practically speaking, to give a promise that flogging should be abolished. Again, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) said that, for his own part, he felt satisfied that the Government did mean to give way upon this question; and now I see that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), who acts as a sort of Guardian Angel to Her Majesty's Government, and who sometimes chides and chastises the children whom he loves, said that he had listened attentively to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, and that there had been an impression conveyed to Members on that side of the House that the Government did intend to give way. Therefore, if any hon. Members were misled, apparently one of them was my hon. and gallant Friend, who said—

"He was therefore going to put a question plainly and directly to the Government, because they had no right to keep hon. Members in that position. . . . They had a right to ask whether it was the intention of the Government to give way, because, if that were the case, Ministers ought not to call upon them to make statement if at the end the whole question was to be sacrificed, and that it was to go forth at the last that the Government were in the wrong, and that the few Members who opposed them were in the right."—[3 Hansard, ccxlvii. 1571.]

It was impossible to make a more direct appeal to the Government than that made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. If the Government had made up their minds that concession had gone to its utmost limits, and that when they had promised the Schedule and a reduction of the number of lashes they could do no more; when they were told by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex that the impression had been conveyed to many people, and apparently to him, that the Government were about to give way upon the subject of flogging altogether; when they were called upon distinctly to say whether it was their intention to give way, what was the natural course that one would have expected them to take? Why, that they would have said at once—"This is entirely a mistake; we have no intention at all of giving up flogging; we have our Schedule under consideration, and we shall place it before the House." That would have been a very simple statement to make; but the very next speaker who rose was the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, who said that—"The Government had taken a course known to the House previously, and that they were now prepared to re-consider the whole question." What was the meaning of that statement? It is important to know this, because the statement was made in answer to the appeal of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex. Now, the right hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to-night to tell us what that statement meant, and why it was necessary, after all those concessions had been made days before, to state that the Government was prepared to re-consider the whole question, and whether they meant to do anything more than they had previously announced. These are points upon which I think the House has a right to have some explanation from the right hon. Gentleman. But that is not all. I do not ask whether there has been any decision of the Cabinet to do away with flogging. But I ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, who is always frank with the House, whether he will tell us that he never entertained any other opinion upon this subject? We have been told a great deal as to the opinion of military authorities. But although we have heard the opinion of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), there is another hon. Member for that county (Colonel Loyd Lindsay), who is a military man of great experience and distinction, and besides a Member of the Government, but whose opinion has never been pronounced in this House upon the question of corporal punishment. Now, that being the state with regard to information in which the Government left the House on Saturday week, my noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition has challenged a denial from the Government, which challenge has never been met, as to the nature of the pressure which was put upon them while they were re-considering their opinion upon this subject. I do not say that their decision had then been taken; but I do say, while they were considering, unless report is more than usually false, that there was a very strong attempt on the part, if I may follow the phrase used to-night by the Secretary of State for War, "of an active section" of their Party to induce them to give up flogging. I again ask for a distinct denial as to whether that is the fact or not? The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex can, no doubt, throw some light upon this point, and if he will get up and say there was no attempt, when the Government were re-considering their opinion, to induce them to give up the punishment of flogging, of course I shall consider his statement conclusive and satisfactory. But there is another fact which has not been denied, and which has to be explained. What was the meaning of the Party meeting of the Conservatives on Monday? The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire must know that there are Caucuses elsewhere than in Birmingham. There are Caucuses in the Foreign Office and elsewhere. The meeting presided over by the Leader of the Government was held—the right hon. Gentleman will contradict me if I am wrong—upon the subject of flogging in the Army. Why was there to be a Party meeting upon this subject. The Government, as they were told now, had made all their concessions days before. They had made the statement which they intended to go forth to the country. On Saturday they said that the whole subject was under re-consideration, and then something happens which makes it necessary to have a Party meeting on Monday. Sir, I think that before we have charges made against us of settling this question upon considerations of Party, we are entitled to have some explanation with regard to that meeting. Of course, there are hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on both sides of the House, and pressure may be put upon Governments as well as upon Oppositions. I remind the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire that our desire is to know whether the decision at which the Government arrived was founded upon the opinion of the military authorities, or whether it was influenced by the pressure of Party politics?—for, although we may be bound to attach weight, and to pay attention to the opinion and determination of the Government, formed independently and upon their own responsibility and that of their military advisers, I do not know that we can be called upon to pay any attention or any respect whatever to a decision influenced by Party meetings at the Foreign Office. It is this which, in my opinion, has totally changed the situation with regard to this matter. The Government began, first of all, by introducing the punishment of flogging into this Bill exactly as it stood before; they then, under the influence of debate, seeing that great modifications could be made in it, proceeded in the path of those modifications up to certain concessions; but why, having made those concessions, they had again to re-consider the whole question, I know not. But what we had a right to expect, and what the country had a right to expect, was that the Government should be allowed to come to a conclusion upon this matter uninfluenced by Party pressure, and that is what my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) meant, as I understood him, when he said that the Government had weakened the authority upon which their necessity for the punishment of flogging rests. The noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade completely misunderstood the remarks of my right hon. Friend, when he said that he had asked “What authority is it that you are alleging in favour of this punishment?” My right hon. Friend never said anything of the kind. What he did say was that—“This punishment can only rest upon the strongest authority, and in the conviction of the House, and in the conviction of the country, by the course which you have taken in the progress of this discussion, you have undermined that authority, because you have shown from the first that you were of opinion that it did not rest upon any solid basis.” You change from point to point; you exhibit what my hon. Friend called the most lamentable ignorance with reference to the administration of this punishment. The error which existed as to the “cat” is a very material point and tended to the undermining of corporal punishment, because it is a very important thing to know that it is not administered with unnecessary severity. The late First Lord of the Admiralty, having given a pledge to this House that there should be a pattern “cat” kept at the Admiralty, when it turned out that nobody knew where that pattern cat was, all the confidence that rested upon that pledge was very gravely shaken. All these things have gone far to shake the authority upon which this matter rests. Thus, the Secretary of State says—“After this you propose an Amendment fatal to the Bill.” What can he mean by that statement? Does it mean that if the majority of the House of Commons declares against flogging, this Government or any other Government would carry on flogging in the Army? Does he mean that the Government would go on without any Bill of this kind at all? The only result of carrying this Resolution would be that corporal punishment would be struck out of the Bill. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire thinks it is a great thing to say that it is a question between the bullet and the lash. You are all for shooting the soldier. What sense was there in making that assertion, after the alternative offered by my noble Friend, who has offered you the lash as a substitute for the bullet, which you refused? He said, in every case where you shoot you may flog, and you refused it. [“No!”] What is the use of saying “No!” when everybody knows it is the fact? He offered a clause which distinctly declared that flogging should be accepted as a substitute for shooting. If the hon. Member who said “No” did not accept it, the Government, who are much more important, refused to accept flogging as a substitute for shooting, and that meant that they demanded that there should be flogging where there was no shooting. The House and the country will understand it, and it is, therefore, of no use making a statement to the contrary. The hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) has to-night fallen into a most extraordinary error. The hon. Member has read to the House a Memorandum of offences, and he was cheered when he said that these are offences for which men must be shot. Everybody knows that that is not the fact. They may be shot for them; but that is a very different thing. What, then, becomes of his point, and the cheers with which it was received, of the officer saying to the man—"My dear fellow, I should like to punish you in some other manner, but I must shoot you?" But, then, there is the case of foreign Armies. We are told that this is the only country which has to deal with barbarous tribes, and that, therefore, we must flog. Are we the only country who has to deal with barbarous tribes? I think France had something to do with barbarous tribes in Algiers; but the French Army has no flogging. Then, there is what is called the most aggressive Army in the world, marching about in Central Asia. The tribes in Khiva and Merv, I think, are pretty barbarous; and yet, according to my information, the Russian Army does not flog. Sir, I say most distinctly that hon. Gentlemen opposite must judge of my conduct with regard to this Bill as they please. I do not regard it as a Party question; but allow me to say that I do regard it as not only a military question, but as a political question, and, as a political question, I have to ask myself with reference to corporal punishment, can it be sustained? and that is what I mean by its being a political question. I do not at all profess to have altered my opinions as to the difficulties of dispensing with this punishment. I feel those difficulties just as strongly now as I did before; but I ask, can you sustain this punishment against the weight of opinion which exists in this House and in the country? Every man must form his own opinions on that subject as best he may; but I think hon. Gentlemen opposite will agree that if this punishment cannot be permanently maintained it is one about which it is not worth while to make a protracted struggle, and that it can only be mischievous to everybody concerned in the matter that it should be the subject of repeated debates in this and future Sessions. I do not think that the Secretary of State for War will believe I take him, at all events, by surprise, when I say that for many weeks I have been of opinion that this punishment could not be permanently maintained. I was extremely unwilling to press the Government, or to place them in a false position with relation to the subject. It has long been my opinion, and I have never concealed it, that this punishment can never be maintained. In that case, is it wise that the contest should be continued with reference to it? There are many subjects on which political Parties on both sides of the House have seen fit to change opinions long cherished and long maintained. That took place with reference to the Catholic Claims, to Free Trade, and to Household Suffrage. Why was it that the Party opposite changed their opinion on these matters? It was because the political situation and the opinion of the country made it absolutely necessary that such change should take place. I do not believe that hon. Gentlemen opposite who supported the Catholic Claims, Free Trade, and Household Suffrage did so because they were any more enamoured of them than they were before their opinion concerning them was changed; but all Parties alike, on whichever side they may sit, must consider questions of this kind with reference to the opinion of the country. Sir, I have come to the conclusion that this question, having been thrown by an act of the Government into the crucible of debate—for it was their act to bring this Bill for military discipline under the revision of the House—has made it necessary that we should come to a final decision with regard to it. The more I have listened to these discussions the more I have become convinced that this punishment can no longer be ultimately and permanently maintained, and it is for that reason I shall give my vote in favour of the Motion of my noble Friend.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have waited with some curiosity to hear the speech which we might have expected from the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, because he has occupied a very peculiar position with reference to this measure. I think it is due from the Government and from the House that we should take the earliest opportunity of tendering to the hon. and learned Gentleman our thanks for the loyal assistance which he has given to the Government and to the House in the conduct of this Bill. He took a very useful and active part in the discussion in Committee upstairs, over which, I think, he presided, and which was to a great extent the parent of this Bill; and since the Bill was introduced in the form decided upon by Her Majesty's Government, the hon. and learned Gentleman has throughout the whole of the discussions which have taken place with regard to it given an intelligent and discriminating, but most valuable, support to the Government in the conduct of the measure. I think everybody must admit that this Bill, which has been under discussion for the greater part of this Session, which has been before us in Committee no less than 21 times, has at the end of the Session come out a very considerable and important measure. Everybody must admit that during the discussions upon this measure we have had many and fair opportunities for the consideration of great principles such as this of corporal punishment. Everybody must feel that the matter has been brought forward fully, repeatedly, and I might almost say pertinaciously, by hon. Members who took an interest in it. And over and over again the principles, the details, and their application, have been considered, discussed, and decided upon by large majorities in the House; and the Government throughout these discussions have, I think, shown themselves ready to entertain in the fairest and most candid spirit the observations and the arguments which have been addressed to them from different parts of the House. We have endeavoured in the most sincere manner to bring about a settlement which might be of a fair, of a durable, and generally acceptable character. But we have felt that it has been a sad necessity in the conduct of military discipline that we should, from time to time, have recourse to severe repressive punishments. We have felt, and it has been the firm belief which our Predecessors have always entertained, that, however disagreeable that necessity might be, it was one which it was impossible to escape from if discipline and the credit of the Army was to be maintained. I say nothing about other countries. Other countries have their systems, which differ from ours in a great many respects, such as have been pointed out. We have our system and our own difficulties, and we have to consider in what manner we have to meet those difficulties. It may be that in other countries there are punishments exactly equal to that of which we have heard so much. It may be that in those countries the situation and conditions of the Armies are different, and it may be that there are amongst them irregular forms of chastisement, which may, to a certain extent, supply in a very unsatisfactory way, I think, a regulated and legal system. We have been considering this question with reference to the circumstances of the British Army, with an earnest desire, while retaining that amount of punishment which is necessary for its discipline, to do away with the objectionable features of former times, which I take to be two—namely, excess in amount, and irregularity in application. Throughout these discussions we have endeavoured to come to some arrangements by which the punishment of flogging may be limited to the smallest effective amount, and by which, when it is administered, it may be given only under strict regulations and for well-defined offences. But after these have been so discussed, and after we have spent days and nights in the elaboration of this Bill, at the last moment, when there is not one single day to spare, when at the last moment this work has been brought to the last stage of completion, and when such important steps have been taken to put the Army on a better footing—at that moment comes forward the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition to put upon the Table of the House, to challenge the decision of the House, upon an Amendment which, whatever you may say as to its possible effect, is, at least, in form, a direct attack upon the Bill. We are told that the Bill will not be destroyed if corporal punishment be taken out of it, and I will not argue the point at present. That, however, is not the matter which we are called upon to decide. We are called upon to meet an Amendment of precisely that character which has over and over again been adopted by an Opposition when it has intended to destroy a measure or a Government. I need not remind hon. Members of old standing in this House of the many occasions on which, when the question was the second reading of some important Bill, a Resolution has been moved declaring that no Bill will be satisfactory which does not do something—this, that, or the other—and it has always been understood that such a Resolution is fatal to a Bill. Nobody can doubt that such a step taken by so important a Member of the House as the Leader of the Opposition is—one which necessarily challenges and excites very serious attention, and all the more so, when we find that it is apparently inconsistent with the views on which the noble Lord and his Colleagues have acted continuously, both in Office and in Opposition, for many years, and to which they have, until within a few weeks ago, given effect. If that is so, we are surprised, and look for some explanation. I must say that, after the explanation of the noble Lord, and after that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), I felt we were left most completely in the dark; but I did think that if we were to hear a speech from the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), then, at least, we might look for a clear and comprehensive statement of the grounds upon which this policy rested. I own I am fairly disappointed. We are treated to discursive observations upon the conduct of the Government in this matter, and upon the conduct of the Government in that matter. We are carried back to the days of Catholic Emancipation, and we have had discussions on Party and Party discipline, all of which are absolutely outside the point. Hon. Gentlemen think they have got some very effective point against the Government, and, under cover of that, propose a most extraordinary and most important Resolution. They say, in effect—"Now, then, if you think that the Government have behaved badly, pass our Resolution." This is very much like the manoeuvres of a conjuror going to do a trick, and who, while preparing to take a handkerchief out of your pocket, calls your attention to something in another part of the room, and then takes the handkerchief when you do not perceive it. We can hardly perceive the particular trick that is about to be performed by the Motion which we are asked to agree to. We are told that this is not a measure dictated by Party motives. Of course, when we are told that, we are ready to accept the disclaimer; but in doing so we are, I must say, left more in the dark than ever, because, if it were dictated by Party motives, we could understand it, but if not, we must confess that we are at a loss to know to what it may be attributed. The noble Lord was very anxious, indeed, to clear himself from the suspicion that he had decided on moving his Resolution because of the disagreement between himself and his Friends and the rest of the Liberal Party. He said—"I will give you chronological proof that I was not animated by any Party motive of that kind;" and the proof was that he had come to the conclusion to do something in this matter because of the outbreak that took place in the Liberal Party. He tells us that he came to the conclusion to act in the matter on Saturday week, and that the outbreak in the Liberal Party did not occur till the Monday following. That may be; but I think it is news to many of us to hear that the Liberal Party were in such a very harmonious state, even up to Saturday week, and the chronological proof seems to me, after all, to be of no great force, for the decision of the noble Lord may be due to something of a desire to conciliate hon. Gentlemen. But what appears to me to be the most extraordinary part of these proceedings is that in the arguments by which the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich support the Resolution, they argue in favour of a course wholly different from that which they have laid before us. They say in their Resolution that they condemn the Bill because it provides for the permanent retention of corporal punishment for military offences; but they go on to tell us that what they are really proposing is, not to do away with corporal punishment altogether, but to offer an alternative for it. If they wished us to substitute corporal punishment for capital punishment, there is a good deal to be said for the change, and all the arguments they use are in that direction. But why in the world do they not come forward and make that proposition to us? Why, I would ask, do they not tell us in the Resolution, which they ask the House to adopt, what it is they really mean? Is it that they mean that corporal punishment is to be substituted for capital punishment—if so, we should know what the Resolution means. Or do they lay stress upon the permanent retention of the punishment? The fact is, that the Resolution has been so framed as to catch the greatest number of votes. By this means they have placed their supporters, especially their military authorities, in a most extraordinary position; for they get up, one after another, and argue very strongly as to the necessity of maintaining discipline and having punishments available, and they go on to say that it is almost impossible to keep order in the field without the power of inflicting corporal punishment, while they still announce it to be their intention to vote for this Amendment. The only reason I have heard given for that course is this—"You have reduced the number of lashes from 50 to 25; and, therefore, you have made the punishment worthless, and as you have made it worthless you may as well abolish flogging altogether." Well, I must say, I think we have a right to complain of that; because, when the proposal was made that the number of lashes should be reduced, we were assured that 25 would be quite adequate for all purposes of punishment. It was said by gentlemen of the highest authority that 25 lashes were quite sufficient for discipline, unless we wanted to inflict torture. Perhaps we are open to the charge that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke), in which he said—"You have brought all these misfortunes upon yourselves by being too ready to make concessions, and by being too willing to meet the House in the spirit in which you have done." We have been told that we have rendered the punishment worthless; and then we have these curious arguments. We are told—"It is true that in former years we always supported corporal punishment, and that until recently we were ready still to support the retention of corporal punishment; but we did so because we rested upon authority. Recently, however, you have destroyed our trust in authority, and we have had to look into the whole question for ourselves, and we have taken the step which we have done." But it does appear to me that the question naturally arises, why have you never considered this for yourselves before? It is all very well to speak of high military authority, and it is perfectly true that military authority must be respected, and must have great weight in the decision of this question. It is new, however, for me to suppose that the responsible Ministers of the Crown are not to examine questions of this sort for themselves, and are not, with the advice and assistance of the military authorities, whom they consult, to consider these questions, and to decide upon them and recommend them to Parliament in the way in which, after full consideration, they think it is right they should be recommended. But now we are told that it was in consequence of what was said in this House on Saturday week that the whole thing changed, and that a new situation was created. Why, what happened on Saturday week? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford said—"I think that, previous to Saturday week, the Government had gone the full length of all that it was prepared to do, and had agreed to reduce the number of lashes to 25, and had promised that offences for which flogging was to be administered should be placed in a Schedule." "But," he said, "an end had been put to that state of affairs by the Government stating that it was going to consider the whole question." He said—"We fell from you because we thought you had entirely changed your position." But does the hon. and learned Gentleman think that because we promised to put those offences in a Schedule that was to be the "be all and end all" of the matter? Does he not know that it was only an adjournment of the difficulty connected with the settling of the Schedule? The hon. and learned Gentleman knows perfectly well, if any man does, that the framing of that Schedule had been under the careful consideration of the Government, with the assistance of the military authorities, and he knows perfectly the difficulties that we found in attempting to enumerate the particular offences that were to be put in that Schedule. He was, unfortunately, unable to be present here on Saturday; but if he had been, he would have heard what was said by my right hon. and gallant Friend—namely, that he had found great difficulty in the construction of the Schedule, and that when he was prepared he would make a statement upon the whole subject of flogging, which he thought would be satisfactory to the House. That was the remark that was made by my right hon. and gallant Friend, and was perfectly consistent with what has been done since. We stated that we were prepared to re-consider the whole Schedule, and to place it upon an intelligible and firm basis, and we have done so by the adoption of the principle that only offences punishable by death shall be liable to the punishment of flogging. We are now told that by making that statement we misled the House. I am very sorry if we did mislead the House; but I do not believe we did. The noble Lord, speaking a little while ago, and referring to a speech made by a noble Friend of mine out of this House, said that it was remarkable that the criticisms of that noble Lord upon the conduct of the Opposition did not come from those who saw with their own eyes what the conduct of the Opposition was, but from one who only heard it from the outside. I would appeal from the testimony of those who did not see what took place on that occasion to the testimony of some who did. The noble Lord was not in his place at the time those statements were made; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) was in his place.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he heard the right hon. Gentleman.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am speaking of a later period. At the time my right hon. Friend made his original statement, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford was in his place; and he immediately rose and declared that, for his part, he was prepared to advocate the total abolition of flogging. On the following Monday, when the question arose on the part of some hon. Members as to whether the statement which was made on Monday evening on behalf of the Government was in accordance with what was said on Saturday, or involved any breach of a promise on the part of the Government, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford said—"No, certainly, it did not involve any breach. The Government did not pledge themselves to this, and, as a proof of that, I was not satisfied with what they did say, though I hoped that they would end by deciding in favour of the abolition of flogging." I remember perfectly well how several hon. Gentlemen, on both sides of the House, complained of the statements made by my right hon. and gallant Friend and myself as being vague and unsatisfactory. The fact is, they tried to get from us what we were not prepared to say; they tried to get from us, when we said we were going to consider the subject, the result of what our consideration was going to be. Because we tried to answer the questions which were put to us, and which we were at perfect liberty to do, they said that our statements were very unsatisfactory, and rumours and reports were issued as to the meaning of those statements. I will say that a more extraordinary march of rumour I never witnessed in the whole course of my life than that which took place in the course of the afternoon. One felt that rumour was verifying the character given to her by Virgil, that she was rising from the ground, and marching with her head continually going higher and higher, and at last losing herself among the clouds. There were a great deal of very cloudy sentiments and curious reports going about at that time; but there really was no foundation for them at all. There was no justification whatever for them. Whether our language was or was not careful, there was no pledge given on the part of the Government—there was no pledge of any sort or kind given on the part of the Government beyond this, that we would consider the question, and make a statement. We did consider the question, and made a statement, and we redeemed our pledge; and I maintain that the conduct of the Government in the matter was that which it was our duty to pursue. It is all very well to say that we have not been guided by the opinion of military authorities in this matter. We decline to shelter ourselves behind the responsibility of anyone else. We did not take the view which hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to think we should take—namely, that we can be dispensed from the duty of considering this question. But if it is any consolation to noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen opposite to know it, I may tell them that we were, in the consideration of the question, in constant communication with the highest military authorities—with the proper military authorities, not with all the junior officers of the Army, who are now set up as the persons whom we ought to consult. We consulted those who are in a responsible position, and have to answer for the discipline of the Army; and it was after such consultation, and after being in perfect possession of their views, and upon our own responsibility and our own consideration, that Her Majesty's Government arrived at the decision which it afterwards announced to the House. We have been told that the course we took was one which had been pressed upon us by a Party meeting; but I do not think that it is necessary to answer that observation. We have been told that there are Caucuses existing here, and possibly that is so. At any rate, it is quite possible for the Liberal Party to meet without attracting much attention. But, so far as we are concerned, we are, unfortunately, obliged to occupy a large space in the public eye when we meet. If the noble Lord is of opinion that the decision arrived at and announced by the Government was not a decision freely taken by it, upon the result of its own convictions, or that it was a conviction forced upon it by any other consideration than its own idea, and what was right and proper for the Public Service, then I say that the noble Lord is entirely wrong. The question which the House has to consider, and from which it must not allow itself to be led astray by suggestions of Party recrimination, or by tales of Party meetings, or of anything else, is the Resolution proposed by the noble Lord. It is all very well to say that such a Resolution, if accepted, is not fatal to the Bill, for you know perfectly well that that is the effect of your Resolution. We say that the Resolution is brought forward under circumstances of pressure, and we say that the arguments which have been brought forward in support of it do not support the proposition involved in it. We say that the arguments of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) and of the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Otway) are perfectly consistent, and they were only right in supporting such a proposition as that involved in the Resolution. But the arguments of the noble Lord, and of hon. Gentlemen who sit behind him, are in favour of a wholly different proposition, which is not before us, and which has never been before us. This Resolution is, in fact, brought before us as a sort of stalking-horse to mask the retreat of the Opposition from a proposal which, if made at all, should have been made the preamble of a proposal which nobody understood. At all events, the arguments had been arguments rather in support of that proposition than of the direct attack which has now been made. I call upon the House, if they value this Bill, and if they desire to see the great Code, which has been now, at so much labour, brought to its present shape—if they desire to see it carried into law—I hope they will support the Government and reject the Amendment.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 19, after the word "enemy," to insert the words "in such manner as to show cowardice."—(Colonel Stanley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. PARNELL that he had an Amendment to move on Clause 3.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that I have already put a Question on Clause 4.

MR. PARNELL: It was quite impossible to hear you, Sir, put the Question. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that I have already put the Question on Clause 4, "That these words be here inserted," and it is impossible, as the hon. Member knows, for the House to go back upon former clauses.

MR. PARNELL moved the adjournment of the debate. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was good enough to say that he would give an opportunity, in case of the debate on flogging continuing to a late hour in the evening, to proceed with the other Amendments.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Parnell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the request was quite reasonable, and perfectly in accordance with the understanding. He would not press the House to go on then; but he did hope at the Morning Sitting of the next day they would be able to get through.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT BILL [Lords].—[Bill 114.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Second Reading.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was anxious to make an appeal to the hon. Member for Meath, and to ask him whether he would not take off the blocking Motion which stood against this Bill on the second reading. The measure was of great importance to the commercial community; and he did hope, therefore, that the hon. Member would take off the Motion which prevented its consideration.

MR. PARNELL said, his only object in making the Motion he had done was that he saw that a very dangerous precedent was about to be established by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had no wish to interfere in any way with the progress of the Bill, and he certainly would not intrude on the debates if the Bill were allowed to go into Committee in the ordinary way. He would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was rather too late in the Session to try the experiment which he had proposed of submitting this Bill to a Grand Committee; but that it would be far better that it should go through the Committee in the ordinary way. It was only because he felt that a very dangerous precedent was about to be set up as regarded minorities in that House that he gave Notice of the Motion which stood in his name; and had the idea been opposed, he certainly would have found it necessary subsequently to have opposed the appointment of the Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, no doubt, it was very important that this Bill should be read a second time. The suggestion that it should be referred to a Grand Committee did not come from the Government, but from many quarters of the House, and the Government were, at the time, disposed to consider it, and to see whether that was a course which they might not entertain. But, for himself, he thought, perhaps, the better course would be to allow the Bill to go before a Committee of the Whole House in the ordinary way. For his own part, he thought it was not very likely there would be any big opposition to the Bill, because a great part of it was merely re-enacting an old law. Perhaps, under those circumstances, the best course would be to adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson). That suggestion was that the portion of the Bill which re-enacted the law of 1869 should be excised, and that the Bill should be turned into a measure merely introducing certain Amendments into the old law. That was a suggestion coming from an hon. and learned Member—all of whose suggestions were valuable—which was well worthy of consideration. For his part, he thought the best way would be to take the Bill in the ordinary way.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, it was quite a mistake for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to suppose that there was at all an unanimous feeling out-of-doors that this Bill should be proceeded with this Session. He had received a telegram that day from a very important Association in Manchester on this subject; and as expressing the opinion and feeling of a large portion of the commercial community of Manchester he should like to be allowed to read it—

“The Credit Association of Manchester, representing a large body of merchants, bankers, and wholesale traders, vehemently protests against the passing of any new Bankruptcy Bill this Session, the time being insufficient for discussing the clauses seriatim and hearing the evidence of commercial witnesses.”

He did not know what the opinion of other towns might be; but this, at any rate, was a statement from a very important body with strong interests in this Bill. In his opinion, it would be a great mistake to proceed with it.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD quite agreed that the Law of Bankruptcy, at present, was in a state—

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that it is not regular to discuss the Bill at this stage. The only Question before the House is that the second reading be taken to-day at 2 o'clock.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he was only about to express a hope that the Attorney General would not carry out the proposition he had just suggested, and divide the Bill into two. He trusted that the Bill would either be discussed in its present shape, or put off for the Session.

MR. RYLANDS thought, as a matter of procedure, it was very inconvenient, after the hon. Member for Meath had put this stopper on the Bill, that now, without Notice, it should be read a second time at that late hour in the evening, when there was no expectation of taking the second reading that night.

Adjourned Debate on Second Reading further adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE
ACTS AMENDMENT BILL. [Lords].

(Mr. Attorney General.)

[BILL 134.] COMMITTEE.

[Progress 9th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

New Clause (Expenses of references held out of London) brought up, and read the first time.

Question proposed, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."

MR. DILLWYN moved the omission of the clause. Formerly, before the appointment of official referees, the work was done by arbitrators, who gave a patient hearing to the case before they came to a final decision. However, dissatisfaction was expressed at the great expense and the great delays through frequent adjournments, and to remedy this the official referees were appointed, and it was hoped that they would overcome the difficulty. That expectation was disappointed, as it was found their fees were very heavy, which prevented people from going to them, and the decisions were not final. After an official referee had given his decision, his judgment could be appealed against and carried to another court. As a consequence, business did not go to them in the way expected. To remedy this the fees were materially reduced about a year ago, and there was a prospect, at last, of the official referees getting more work for their courts than at present; but this clause provided that any expenses incurred by the referees in the discharge of their duties should not be paid by the Treasury out of monies provided by Parliament; but that the costs of the referees sitting elsewhere than in London, the travelling and other expenses incurred in and about the reference by reason of the sitting being held out of London, including the accommodation for sittings, should be defrayed and paid for by the parties. Now, he thought their object should be to reduce, as far as possible, the expenses of all litigation; and where a reference was forced upon litigants by Judges the costs should be borne by the State. The litigants had now no choice in the matter. They went before a Judge, expecting their cases to be tried, and he declined to try the case, and sent it to a reference. Under such circumstances, the expenses of the reference should be paid by the State, just in the same way that other expenses were; and he could see no more justice in saddling litigants with these costs than in making them pay the travelling expenses of the Judges at the Assizes. The result was, to refuse justice to a poor man who might have scraped together enough money to go to trial before a Judge, and would not be able to carry on subsequent litigation before a referee. He moved that the clause be struck out.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) replied, that the fees payable to referees were very small indeed. The amount payable to the Treasury for the services of the official referee for each reference, irrespective of length, was the sum of five guineas. That was a very moderate sum, infinitely less than the amount for which the services of an ordinary arbitrator could be obtained, while there was another advantage in employing the referees—that they sat de die in diem until the matter was disposed of. Therefore, if the parties preferred that the referee should go down to Liverpool, or anywhere else, to try a case, it was only fair that they should pay the travelling expenses, and so on, of the referees in going there. He thought the clause a very fair one, and should oppose its omission.

MR. B. WILLIAMS said, his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had confounded, to some extent, the functions of a referee and an arbitrator. Under the old Common Law Procedure Act, the arbitrator was a Judge appointed by the parties. It was a private affair, and he merely did the work which the parties thought he could do better than a Judge or a jury. But when the official referees were appointed, they were appointed to do not the work which the parties privately agreed could be done by arbitrators better than a Judge, but to do the work of the Judges themselves. Under the old law, except for matters of account between parties, there was no power at all to compel a person to resort to arbitration. The Judicature Act had changed all that; and it very often happened now, if the Judge thought the matter was at all complicated, that he threw up his pen, leant back in his chair, and declared that he could not try the issue, but it must go before an official referee. Then, of course, as his hon. Friend had said, it became a question between the rich man and the poor man. By this clause, parties were compelled not only to pay the travelling expenses of the referee, but he believed, also, the expenses of staying in the town where reference was held, which did not strike him as very fair. Referees were, practically, the same as Judges, and the parties who went before them ought to be treated in exactly the same manner. One of the great necessities of the present time, and the great aim of all law reformers, was, and ought to be, to cheapen procedure in law; while, on the contrary, all modern reforms seemed to have gone in exactly the opposite direction.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 29: Majority 28. — (Div. List, No. 173.)

Clause agreed to.

MR. CHARLEY said, a great anomaly had been introduced, by reason of which solicitors had a right of audience as counsel in the Court of Bankruptcy. The Bill, as it now stood, would intensify that anomaly by giving solicitors a right of audience as counsel in the Supreme Court of Judicature. It might be said that it would only give them a right of audience in the particular division to which the Court of Bankruptcy was attached; but he could not obtain from his hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney General) an assurance that this clause would not also give solicitors a right of audience in the Court of Appeal, and even before the House of Lords, in bankruptcy matters. The 70th section said that they should have a right of audience in any Bankruptcy Court; and the Court of Appeal, and even the House of Lords, he contended, would be Bankruptcy Courts for that purpose. The duties of solicitors and barristers were quite distinct. Solicitors had to prepare and to sift evidence, to lay the case before the barrister and to instruct him in the cause; while the duty of the barrister was to appear as an advocate in Court. If it was thought right that the office of solicitor and barrister should be amalgamated, it surely should not be done in this indirect way, and certainly the point ought not to be left in doubt. He would, therefore, move the following clause:—

"Section seventy of 'The Bankruptcy Act, 1869,' is hereby repealed, except as to anything heretofore duly done thereunder; and, instead thereof, Be it Enacted, That every solicitor of the Supreme Court shall be and may practise as a solicitor of the London Court of Bankruptcy after its union and consolidation with the Supreme Court of Judicature under this Act; and if any person not being such solicitor practises as a solicitor of the London Court of Bankruptcy he shall be deemed guilty of a contempt of Court."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, it was not the desire of the Government, by this Bill, either to increase or diminish the privileges of solicitors. Their object was to leave them exactly in the same position as they now occupied. He did not think the Bill changed their privileges in any way. If it did, he would be very anxious to propose some clause which would have the effect of keeping them the same as they were before. He could not assent to this clause; but he would consider the matter further, and if he thought it was requisite to have any clause for the purpose suggested, he would bring one up on Report.

MR. BULWER entirely agreed with the spirit of the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Charley). The Bill, as it stood, was open to the construction that a right of audience was to be given to solicitors in the Supreme Court in bankruptcy matters. Without speaking in any illiberal spirit, he was sure everyone would wish that whatever rights and privileges were conferred upon solicitors should not be conferred upon them by a side wind, but only after mature consideration and discussion. In his opinion, it was very desirable to keep the two branches of the Profession distinct.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS did not think the Bill made any difference, his own impression being that it effected no change whatever. He, therefore, hoped his hon. and learned Friend opposite would be satisfied with the assurances of the Attorney General, and that he would not divide.

MR. B. WILLIAMS wished to observe that the Bill did make a change, for it constituted the Court of Bankruptcy a portion of a division of the High Court of Justice. The Bill proposed to give the solicitors the same right of audience as they had when the Court of Bankruptcy was separate, and so it gave them a right of advocacy in the High Court. If so important a change was to be made, he entirely agreed with his hon. and learned Friends opposite (Mr. Charley and Mr. Bulwer) in thinking that it should not be made by a side wind. It was very desirable that the tone of advocacy in their Courts should be kept up, especially in the High Court of Justice. And for that purpose, as things were at present, the Bar ought not to have their right of audience interfered with.

Mr. CHARLEY observed, that the Attorney General had very fairly promised to consider the matter before the Report; and as his hon. and learned Friend had heard opinions expressed by several eminent members of the Bar, he hoped on the Report the hon. and learned Gentleman would feel it necessary to deal with this question by bringing up a clause. He begged to withdraw his Amendment.

Mr. MONK observed, that the four hon. and learned Gentlemen who had spoken seemed to express an opinion that solicitors who had a right to be heard in the Court of Bankruptcy should not have an audience in the High Court of Justice. If they did possess a right of appearing in the Court of Bankruptcy, and the Court of Bankruptcy was to become a part of the High Court of Justice, he certainly thought the same privilege which attached to them now ought to attach to them hereafter. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. and learned Gentleman would not consider that the general feeling of the House was that solicitors should not have the same rights after this Bill became law as they possessed at present.

New Clause.

(Entry of actions in district registry.)

"Whereas it is expedient to provide for the entry for trial of actions or the issues therein in district registries, and to enable such actions and issues to be entered and lists thereof prepared before the opening of the commission of assize, it shall be lawful for any person giving notice of trial of an action or issue elsewhere than in London or Middlesex, and provided there is a district registry at the town where such action or issue is to be tried, to enter the action or issue for trial at any time after the close of the pleadings, and up to and including the day prior to the commission day of the assize at which such action or issue is to be tried in the district registry of the town where the trial is to be had. The registrar of each district registry shall make a list of all actions and issues so entered in his registry in the order in which they are entered, and shall send it to the associate or other proper officer on or before the commission day of the assize."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

KNIGHTSBRIDGE AND OTHER CROWN LANDS BILL—[BILL 231.]

(Mr. Gerard Noel, Mr. Secretary Stanley.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. GERARD NOEL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the Bill had three objects. First, to make improvements in the entrance towards Hyde Park Corner by Knightsbridge Barracks; secondly, to transfer a portion of land now under the control of the Woods and Forests to the control of the Office of Works. This piece of land abutted on Hampton Court Park, and as the Office of Woods had no officer there to superintend it, it was very desirable it should be transferred. The third object of the Bill was to permit two portions of land to be given up to the Office of Works to replace land taken from Regent's Park in order to form a new approach over the canal at Gloucester Gate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gerard Noel.)

Mr. DILLWYN thought that, as they were dealing with Crown property, they ought to consider whether it would be wise to transfer it to the Chief Commissioner of Works; and for this purpose he thought Bills of this kind should not be brought on late at night. He had intended, therefore, to put down Notice of Opposition to it; but on looking at the measure he found it was a small Bill for a practical purpose, and, therefore, he did not propose to offer any opposition to it.

Mr. MONK pointed out that it was proposed, when this Bill had been read a second time, to refer it to a Select Committee. That Committee was to consist of only three Members, and he thought that was very undesirable. A Committee of less than five would not give satisfaction to the House, and for that reason he should oppose the Bill at the next stage.

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the Committee would consist of five; but two of its Members would be nominated by the Committee of Selection.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on July 18, Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. MONCKTON, Lord CHARLES BRUCE, Mr. ISAAC, and Two to be nominated by the Committee of Selection:—With power to send for persons, papers, and records:—Ordered, Three to be the quorum.

QUESTION.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—REPORTED SUBMISSION OF CETEWAYO.

QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN: Before we adjourn, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies a Question. There is a rumour in the Lobby that Cetywayo has sent in his submission. I should like to ask him, Whether he has received any telegram to that effect; and whether he can give the House any information respecting it?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have this evening received a telegram, dated Natal, June 30, from which it appears that at that date our Forces were within 12 miles of Ulundi; and that General Marshall had reported that messengers had reached him from Cetywayo, bringing with them elephants' tusks, which are the sign of a message from the King. It does not, however, appear what the purport of the message was.

MOTIONS.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION (COMMENCEMENT) BILL.

On Motion of Colonel STANLEY, Bill to bring into force "The Army Discipline and Regulation Act, 1879;" and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Colonel STANLEY, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, and The JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 248.]

COMMISSIONERS OF WOODS (THAMES PIERS) BILL.

On Motion of Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, Bill to authorise the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests and Land Revenues to agree with the Conservators of the River Thames on the payments for Piers or Landing-places in or upon the bed or shore of the River Thames, ordered to be brought in by Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON and Mr. GERARD NOEL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 249.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 18th July, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Bills of Sale (Ireland) * (155).

Second Reading—Public Loans Remission * (144).

Report—Tramways Orders Confirmation * (135); Highway Accounts (Returns) * (143).

Third Reading—Inclosure Provisional Order (Whittington Common) * (136); Cork Borough Quarter Sessions * (142), and passed.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE DEFEAT AT ISANDLANA—THE COURT OF INQUIRY.—QUESTION.

LORD TRURO asked, Why Colonel Harness, who could give very full information with regard to the Isandlana disaster, was put upon the Court of Inquiry—a course which deprived the Court of the assistance of a most important witness?

VISCOUNT BURY, in reply, said, the suggestion that Colonel Harness was put upon the Court of Inquiry to deprive it of a material witness was a presumption which the noble Lord was not justified in putting forward.

LORD TRURO explained, that what he said was that that was the effect of the appointment. He did not say it was done for that purpose.

VISCOUNT BURY: The noble Lord who commands in South Africa is a Member of your Lordships' House, and he is not here to defend himself. The War Office is not in possession of the information which would enable you to come to a conclusion. In these circumstances I think we are bound to suspend our judgment.

SOUTH AFRICA—LATEST TELEGRAM.
QUESTION.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY asked the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government had received any further news from the Cape?

EARL CADOGAN, in reply, said, that the latest news the Government had received was contained in the following telegram from Sir Garnet Wolseley to the Colonial Office, dated Pietermaritzburg, Natal, 30th June, 1879, and which he would read to their Lordships:—

“Pietermaritzburg, Natal, June 30, 1879.—From aspect of affairs, believe war can be finished this season. I am raising corps of 4,000 carriers to work with Crealock's column; can, if necessary, increase their number very largely. I am landing stores and forage at Port Durnford, where I also intend landing marines and reinforcements. I hope to land there myself on Wednesday morning. Telegraph communication completed to that point. Crealock's head-quarters now there. Hope to push with his column to St. Paul's Mission Station, and so join Second Division and Wood's Column, both of which are now at point about 12 miles south-west of Ulundi, near Magnibonium on official maps. King says wants peace; to test his sincerity I have to-day sent back his two messengers to say he must send three of his councillors, who I have named, to meet my agent in First Division camp, where terms of peace can be discussed. Best information says he can only now bring about 10,000 men into the field. Have taken measures of informing Zulu people that all who join us with their families will be well treated and protected, and their cattle assured to them. Many have already come in. Have placed Lord Chelmsford in command of Second Division and of Wood's force until I can reach them. Have no difficulty in flashing orders to him. Weather fine. Health of troops in the field good. Went round hospitals here this morning; only 100 sick and wounded, all doing well and wanting for nothing. Loss of oxen by sickness considerable; hope to supply their places by mule and carrier transport. All quiet in Natal, where General Clifford commands all troops, whether regulars or Native levies. I am receiving the most cordial support and valuable assistance from Sir Henry Bulwer. There had been no fighting since last mail; no news of importance from the Transvaal; have ordered Colonel Lanyon to undertake no offensive operation, and to restrict his operations to protection of life and property, and to curtail expenses in every possible way. Have just heard from General Marshall that the King sent in the ivory tusks, which is a sign of the message being from the King, also the cattle taken from us at Isandlana; cattle kept by Chelmsford, but tusks sent back with repeated demand for the guns taken at Isandlana.”

“July 1. — Have just received news that Chelmsford was to move his force yesterday five miles front without tents, expected to be at Ulundi to-day; considerable bodies of enemy close to Ulundi; written despatch from Chelmsford will reach me this afternoon, and I then embark for Port Durnford.”

METROPOLITAN AND METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAY COMPANIES
BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES): Having seen the Notice of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Camperdown), that he intends, on the third reading of this Bill, to move certain Amendments, I may remind your Lordships that it is contrary to the Standing Orders of the House that Amendments should be moved to a Local Bill on the Report, or on the third reading, unless under conditions which have not been complied with in respect of this Bill. The noble Earl cannot now move his Amendments; but I think it would be unfortunate if they were excluded from consideration. I should, therefore, suggest that the third reading should be postponed till Tuesday next. Questions have arisen with regard to widening streets, and the Company are apprehensive of difficulties that may arise in cases where houses may be pulled down, and where the Corporation might interpose. I think that an arrangement might be come to on these points. Of course, we must be very careful in dealing with anything that has been deliberately passed by both Houses of Parliament. If there is anything that can be done in a case of this kind to allow of an improvement which is considered very desirable being carried out—if a fair arrangement between the parties deeply interested in the improvement can be arrived at, we should make some efforts towards that end. I think, my Lords, an opportunity should be afforded for that purpose. Unless something is done, it would be very difficult to get the improvement made at all; and, therefore, we should be very careful what we do in this matter.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I am perfectly ready to accede to the course proposed by the noble Earl. I should be the last to wish to do anything unfair in the matter. The clause

I object to was, in the first instance, rejected by the Committee, and it was ultimately only passed on the statement that if it were struck out the Company would not go on with the Bill. Now, although the Bill is a very important one, and I am anxious to see it become law, yet, at the same time, there are limits beyond which it is not right for us to go in order to secure it. It seems to me that the best course would be for the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees to consider the matter; and I am sure, in a matter of this kind, general assent will be given to any clause or any modification proposed by him.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD: As far as the Committee are concerned who considered the Bill, they are quite satisfied with the conclusion at which they have arrived, and do not wish any alterations made in it. At the same time, if anything which appears to the House on the recommendation of the Chairman of Committees to be an improvement is proposed, they would raise no objection to its consideration.

Third Reading postponed to Tuesday the 22nd instant.

SUCHAIT SINGH—THE CHUMBA SUCCESSION.

QUESTIONS. RESOLUTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY rose to call the attention of the House to the succession of the Raj of Chumba; and to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether a certain Sunned granted to the late Sri Singh, Raja of Chumba, by the Governor General Lord Dalhousie in 1848 was designedly so framed as to disinherit his brother of the whole blood Suchait Singh, who, but for the terms of such Sunned as construed by the Indian Government, was by Hindu Law entitled to succeed to the Raj on the death of Sri Singh in 1870; and if such be the case, what were the reasons for excluding Suchait Singh, then a child under seven years of age; and whether the Government is aware that Suchait Singh, in consequence of the construction of the Sunned of 1848 by the Indian Government, is now reduced to destitution; and to ask how much Colonel Reid is receiving as pension out of the Chumba revenues in addition to the £3,000 a-year paid to the present Superintendent of Chumba; and whether, in view of the possibility of the action of the Government having been erroneous, Her Majesty's Government will direct a maintenance to be provided for Suchait Singh out of the revenues of Chumba until any questions as to the succession can be finally decided; to ask the Secretary of State whether he will cause an independent inquiry to be instituted into the conduct of the present Administrator of the Chumba States? and to move to resolve—

“That this House is of opinion that the claim of Suchait Singh should be investigated, either by referring it to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, or to a Select Committee, or to a special Commission not composed of Indian Government officials.”

The noble Lord said *: My Lords, I ask your Lordships for an indulgent and a patient hearing, because I am pleading for justice. I have sometimes asked myself if I was justified in taking up the time of the House with my inefficient advocacy; but I have come to the conclusion that it is not the weakness of my advocacy that is in fault so much as the apathy of those that opposed me, for it is not long since the noble and learned Lord, who is not now in the House (Lord Selborne), pleaded with the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India for justice and clemency for Sirdar Narain Singh; but, though he spoke with the eloquence which belongs to him, and with all the weight and responsibility of an ex-Lord Chancellor, he obtained no more results than I have done on other occasions. I have no doubt that the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India looks upon me in the light of the importunate widow in the Scriptures; but I have one advantage over that lady, for she addressed herself to a Judge who boasted that he neither feared God nor regarded man; and we know that the noble Viscount does not come under that description. Another strong point in my favour is that the Secretary of State cannot say that he cannot reverse the action of his Predecessor, for the noble Duke, his Predecessor (the Duke of Argyll), in whose time this case was decided, has asked for its re-consideration. This question, moreover, has never been really investigated by the Indian Government, or by independent officials, and it has not gone out of the hands of a very few local officials of the Punjab Government, Suchait Singh, from the long time that his family have lived and reigned in Chumba, has a strong claim on the sympathy of the Scotch Peers, especially of those who have lately taken so strong an interest in the Earldom of Mar. The Moghul Government of Delhi cherished and honoured the Rajputs, and that is a precedent and a tradition which the British Government would do well to follow. This is no Party question, and up to the present time no Conservative Minister is responsible for it. Last year, about this time, I brought before your Lordships the case of the Bungana Pally succession, which, like this, rested upon Lord Canning's promises and charters. A weekly periodical, which gives the briefest summary of the Proceedings of both Houses of Parliament, said that that speech ought to have been delivered to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and not to your Lordships. I entirely agree with that opinion; but the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is closed to those who seek redress. A short time ago, when I urged to your Lordships that access should be given to it, and that cases such as this one should be first decided by judicial authorities, and not by captains or subordinate Revenue officers, the noble Viscount answered me that Lord Canning had made no such promises; but the promise to follow Mussulman and Hindu Law in cases of succession includes and involves the promise of ascertaining judicially what that law is, and that can only be done by legal men, and not by political officials. The opinion, however, of the Civil Service in India is, in general, favourable to Suchait Singh. A short time ago, a deputation waited on the Secretary of State to represent the claims of Suchait Singh; it was introduced by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Tweeddale), who might well interest himself in this matter, for, when he was in the Civil Service of India, his life and that of the other English at Simla was saved at the time of the Mutiny by the exertions and influence of Mutsuddy Ram, the Vizier of Suchait Singh, who has followed his master here into exile; but up to the present time Mutsuddy Ram has received no reward or recognition of his services from the Indian Government. The noble Viscount the Secretary of State would give no other answer to that deputation than that he could not enter into the matter, because it had not been remitted from the Indian Government for his consideration. This is on the ground of an Order published in the Government of India Gazette of March, 1878; and there is good reason to believe that this rule was framed to meet this particular case. The effect of it is to limit the authority of the Home Government, and to shut out the people of India from all hopes of redress of their grievances. After these preliminary observations, I come to the case. Chumba is a Rajput Principality, which for 3,000 years has been held by the family of Suchait Singh. It borders on Cashmere, its area is 3,216 square miles, the revenue is now under £30,000, and the tribute it pays to the Indian Government 10,000 rupees, or £1,000. Sri Singh, the late Rajah of Chumba, received in 1848 a Sunned from Lord Dalhousie, on our taking the Punjaub, granting him the State of Chumba—

“In perpetuity, and to his heirs male who, according to the Shastras, may be his rightful successors. In the event of the Rajah having no male heirs, his next brother who may be the eldest of his surviving brothers will succeed him.”

Sri Singh had a brother of the same mother, Suchait Singh. He had also a half-brother, Gopal Singh, who had not been recognized as a son by his father, Charrat Singh, nor had been brought up in the palace. Gopal Singh was older than Sri Singh and Suchait Singh. This is disputed. It is certain that he was older than Suchait Singh. In 1870 Sri Singh died, and, before his funeral rites were performed, Colonel Reid, the Superintendent of the Finances of Chumba, hastened to place Gopal Singh on the guddee, or throne, of Chumba, on the ground of the words of the Sunned, and that he was the eldest of the surviving brothers. Now, the cause of all the mischief, and of the setting aside of the lawful heir, Suchait Singh, was the mistake originally made by Colonel Lake, when Lord Dalhousie's Government was misinformed that there were three brothers, when there were only two. Later on, another mistake was made, which I will refer to further on. Lord Dalhousie's Sunned refers to rights under the Hindu Shashtra; he would not, therefore, knowingly have preferred a half-brother to a full brother. I have, therefore, put down upon the

Lord Stanley of Alderley

Notice Paper the first Question, and the answer which must necessarily be given to it will show that Lord Dalhousie was misinformed, and led to believe that there were three equal brothers. Suchait Singh wishes me to state that there has never been any enmity or ill-feeling between him and Gopal Singh, and that Gopal Singh always writes to him recognizing Suchait Singh's rank. It is with reluctance that Suchait Singh has allowed me to mention the facts concerning the birth of Gopal Singh. In fact, Gopal Singh was not a brother at all; his mother had three lovers, one is still alive, two were executed, and the mother would also have been executed, had she not been with child, and on account of the intercession of Rajah Zorawer Singh, brother of Charrat Singh. As it was, she was expelled the palace, and Gopal Singh was born prematurely, a seven months' child. It is known that these lovers were executed some time before Sri Singh's birth, which corroborates the assertion that Gopal Singh was born before Sri Singh. Gopal Singh had no provision made for him beyond £50 a-year, which was left him out of compassion by a Ranee of Charrat Singh, who became Sati at the death of her husband. These facts are new facts—that is to say, they have not yet appeared in the official papers; but the Government would have been informed of them had there been any independent inquiry. Suchait Singh was always looked upon by the people of Chumba and by the neighbouring Rajahs as the heir to Sri Singh, his brother; and, notwithstanding occasional differences between the brothers, on two occasions Sri Singh sent Suchait Singh to represent him and appear as Dothain, or second in rank, at the Durbar of Sir John Lawrence; and later of Lord Lawrence, the Viceroy, who gave him the usual presents. I will ask the Secretary of State for India, if he will lay upon your Lordships' Table the Correspondence of Mr. Melville, containing the testimony of the Rajahs at the Gopipoor Dehra Durbar in 1861, as to their heirs, in which Suchait Singh is mentioned as the heir of Sri Singh. When Sri Singh died, his obsequies were delayed till Suchait Singh could arrive from Cashmere, where he had been staying with his relative the Maharajah. The people of Chumba would allow no one but Suchait Singh to perform them. The performance of funeral rites is generally a safe index of the rights of inheritance. And now I ask what, besides a too literal adherence to the words of the Sunned, and a disregard of its reference to the Shastras, were the motives for setting aside Suchait Singh? There were not any of those high political considerations which it is sometimes alleged should have a preference over those legal rights guaranteed by Lord Canning's charters. The State of Chumba is too small for such, and the correspondence shows that Suchait Singh was looked upon as a man of promise, whilst no such hopes were entertained as to Gopal Singh. But whatever political considerations may be alleged as existing in 1870, these were all stultified in 1873, when Colonel Reid and General Taylor found it necessary to depose their puppet, Gopal Singh, and to instal a small child, his son, Sham Singh. But there was another motive of so patent a nature that there is no reason for refraining from saying that it was of a pecuniary nature. Colonel Reid entered the service of Sri Singh with a salary of £1,200 a-year. This was gradually raised to the sum of £3,000 a-year, besides horses, elephants, forage, &c., a large sum out of a total revenue of £30,000, and one which he would probably have lost, if Suchait Singh, an active man, able to administer his own finances, had succeeded. What do your Lordships think of the justice of taking more than £3,000 a-year for a stranger, and the attempt to force Suchait Singh, the heir of so ancient a family, to sell his birthright and renounce his just claims for the sum of £500 a-year? Now, also, that a child is in possession of Chumba, what becomes of its revenues, and how much is absorbed perhaps on the pretence of making roads? I have put down the Question on the Notice Paper as to the amount of Colonel Reid's pension, in addition to the salary of his successor, in order that it may be known how much is drained away from this small State, and the amount of pecuniary interest that exists for the state of things complained of by the people of Chumba, and what was the exact official position of Colonel Reid before and after 1870. And now, after the deposition of Gopal Singh, I take a fresh departure, and the Government of India might, and ought, to have taken a fresh departure, for, according to these words of Lord Dalhousie's Sunned of 1848—

“Should any of the Rajahs of Chumba mismanage the affairs of the country, the British Government will remove him, and appoint in his place another of the family. It is not the object of the British Government to take the country into its hands; the only thing which it has in view is that from the good management of the territory and the impartial administration of justice the people should continue to enjoy peace and happiness.”

The Indian Government should have appointed Suchait Singh, a grown man, to govern Chumba; it should have taken this opportunity to give peace and contentment to the inhabitants of Chumba, many of whom left their country to petition for the return of Suchait Singh and have not been allowed to return to their homes. I know that the noble Viscount the Secretary of State is under the impression that Chumba is well governed and its people perfectly happy, and so long as he makes no inquiry by independent persons he will be informed that it is so; but I must not only tell him that these are vain illusions, I must also ask him to order an official and impartial investigation as to the statements which I am now going to make. At the beginning of this year the complaints of the people of Chumba with regard to the prevalence of bribery became so great that Mr. Burney, the successor of Colonel Reid, thought it necessary to notice and check them. He therefore, last February, summoned the complainants to come to his Court and substantiate their accusations. He dismissed some complaints; but others were substantiated against Abtar Singh and another of the Chumba Vizirs. These he removed, and gave them pensions to the amount of half their pay; but did not oblige them to make restitution of the sums they had received. After this, a Mussulman of Noorpoor said that he had given certain sums for certain people to Mrs. Kelly, the wife of a barrack-master. He was asked why he did that, and he replied—“Because she has influence with your honour.” Mr. Burney upon this was troubled, and hastily closed the Court, and sent this man to the House of Detention. Next day he sent for him again, when he said that he had time in prison to refresh his memory, and he had made out a list of sums given by various people to make the false appear true, and to obtain various offices, and that what was certain was, that they got what they paid for. After this the Mussulman was released, and Mr. Burney went away for a time from Chumba. Amongst other irregularities and illegalities that took place when Colonel Reid and Colonel Taylor set aside Suchait Singh from the throne of Chumba, Colonel Taylor put Suchait Singh under restraint at Umritsir. He could not legally have done this to a Native of British India against whom there was no criminal accusation, still less could he do so in the case of an independent Prince. Colonel Taylor, indeed, alleges that Suchait Singh was intriguing, and had written seditious letters; but none of these letters are in evidence, and I deny that he ever wrote anything seditious, unless that term is also applicable to a statement made in this House, that this House has no jurisdiction over Scotch Peerages on the Roll before the Act of Union. I said before that another mistake had been made with regard to Gopal Singh, and this was that he had been represented to the Duke of Argyll as the full brother, and Suchait Singh as the half-brother, and the despatch of the Duke of Argyll confirming the decision of the Punjab Government, dated July 20, 1871, mentioned Suchait Singh as the half-brother. This mistake was pointed out at the time from India and the despatch cancelled, and an amended despatch substituted. In May last, two gentlemen waited on the Duke of Argyll to point out this mistake and others that had led to the decision then arrived at. The Duke of Argyll wrote a letter to one of them, which I will read to your Lordships, as it entirely does away with the objection sometimes raised against reversing the action of a Predecessor—

“Argyll Lodge, May 19, 1869.

“Sir,—I really cannot do more than I have done. You may, however, show this note expressive of my hope that the case will be seriously re-considered at the India Office, with the view to see whether a mistake has not been committed in the decision come to when I was Secretary of State.

“Your obedient servant.

(Signed) “ARGYLL.

“J. E. Liardet, Esq.”

The writing this letter by the Duke of Argyll was an act of great generosity. A short time ago, at Sheffield, the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India twitted the Duke of Argyll with holding himself to be infallible; but after the letter I have just read that accusation falls to the ground; and if the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook) should refuse to allow of an investigation of this matter, and the "serious reconsideration" of it asked for by the Duke of Argyll, he must take a degree higher than the Duke of Argyll, and hold himself to be what the Italians would call "infallibilissimo." I now move for an investigation into the claim of Suchait Singh, leaving to the Secretary of State the option between three methods of independent inquiry. It is melancholy to think that men with all the talents possessed by Ministers of State, animated as they must be by care for the preservation of the Empire, and the knowledge that it can only be preserved by strict justice and loyal adherence to the Royal Proclamations and Viceregal Charters, should devote too much of their time and energies to Party purposes, and, delegating too much of their authority to subordinate officials, consider themselves as bound by their errors and appear to make it a point of honour to refuse to acknowledge a mistake or to redress a wrong for which they then make themselves responsible, and for which the Empire must inevitably suffer. In conclusion, may I remind the noble Viscount of the words of Camoens—

"Who worketh injury reasonless and vain,
With force engendered by his power of place, Nought conquereth; the sole true conqueror he
Who knows to render justice fair and free?"

Moved to resolve, That this House is of opinion that the claim of Suchait Singh should be investigated either by referring it to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, or to a Select Committee, or to a special commission not composed of Indian Government officials.—
(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that the speech made by the noble Lord must have convinced their Lordships that the House of Lords was not an Assembly suited to the discussion of a question such as that raised by the noble Lord, and he must decline to go into the case. The case had been decided by the Government of the Punjaub and the Indian Government in the time of Lord Mayo; it was considered in the time of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Northbrook), and the decision of those Viceroyalty had been confirmed by the Duke of Argyll as Secretary of State; it had also been considered by his Predecessor in Office (the Marquess of Salisbury), who, in a despatch sent out to India, said the decision come to must be considered as being final. That being so, the Petitioner had sent in a Memorial to the Indian Government for a reconsideration of the case; but it was no part of his duty as Secretary of State to go into the merits of the question. The noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) had gone into the matter very fully, and had asked whether the Sunnud granted to the late Sri Singh was designedly so framed as to disinherit his brother of the whole blood, Suchait Singh? His answer was that the Sunnud of Lord Dalhousie did not in terms disinherit anyone; but directed that a brother of Suchait Singh should succeed to the Raj on the death of Sri Singh. That brother was the eldest, and he did succeed. There never was any question as to the successor being of the half-blood. The noble Lord asked him whether he was aware that Suchait Singh was reduced to a state of destitution? He (Viscount Cranbrook) regretted that the Claimant should have been reduced to destitution in consequence of the case having been decided against him; but he must point out that the Indian Government had told Suchait Singh that if he was willing to accept the decision and go back to India, they would provide means for his maintenance, and the Government at Home would make arrangements for his return. If he would not take the money which was offered to him, it would be his own fault. There was no ground laid for any further inquiries, and he must decline to order any. As to the salary and pension of Colonel Reid, he must say that he was receiving no more than was regularly allowed under the circumstances, and the pension came out of the Revenues of India, and not out of those of Chumba. The pension, which was earned by long services, amounted to £984, and no deduction was made from the Revenues of Chumba on account of it. There was nothing new in the case as set forth by the noble Lord. It was fully gone into by General Taylor, and his Report was adopted by the Government of the Punjaub, and again by the Indian Government, and by the Government at Home, after carefully and fully considering the facts of the case. The noble Lord had complained of the administration of the Chumba estate, and also of other persons, and called upon him (Viscount Cranbrook) to direct an inquiry into the administration of it; but he could not do so upon such statements, and he was astonished that the noble Lord should have made, upon such authority, charges against these persons. In conclusion, he would repeat that Lord Dalhousie had laid down the principles upon which this succession should go. On those principles his Predecessors in the Government in India and at Home had decided, and by that decision he must abide.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, that in 1874, when Viceroy of India, he and his Advisers had occasion to examine into this case, which had been previously settled by his Predecessor, Lord Mayo. The case appeared to them perfectly clear, and the decision of Lord Mayo upon it was adjudged by them to be right. He had, since the present Motion was put upon the Notice Paper, looked again carefully into the documents which were in 1874 placed before him, and he could find no reason whatever for altering the opinion he had then formed. He had listened to the statement of the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) with interest; but had discovered in it no new facts essentially affecting the case. The whole of the facts appeared to be contained in the Papers which were before the Government of India in 1874, and published in The Gazette of India at the time. He entirely concurred in what had fallen from the Secretary of State; and, if he might offer his advice to the Claimant in this case, he would suggest that he should not let himself be deceived by anything which any interested persons might say to lead him to suppose that there was any chance of the case being re-opened and decided in his favour; but that he should at once accept the offer made to him by the Government of India, and should not remain any longer in this country, but return to his Native State and live there quietly on the provision he would receive.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY having briefly replied,

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

Viscount Cranbrook

MEETING OF THE HOUSE TO-MORROW (SATURDAY).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, the Government proposed that the House should meet to-morrow at 5 o'clock for the purpose of receiving the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, should that measure pass through the House of Commons by that time.

BILLS OF SALE (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY (IRELAND) BILL [Lords.] (By Order).

CONSIDERATION, AS AMENDED.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. VERNER, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 17, line 12, to leave out the words, "if any," said, that his object in putting it on the Paper was to ask the House to accept it in the interests of a number of the employés of the Newry and Armagh Railway Company, whose position was destroyed by the passing of this measure. An agreement for amalgamation had been entered into by the Great Northern of Ireland and the Newry and Armagh Railway Companies, and the object of the Bill was to give a Parliamentary sanction to the agreement for the fusion of the two undertakings. Unfortunately, however, that fusion would lead to the dismissal of the employés and servants of the smaller Company; and, therefore, he proposed to amend Clause 14, which, with the words "if any," limited the compensation which was due to the officials of the Newry and Armagh Company, by providing that compensation, not exceeding on the whole the sum of £3,000 be substituted, which would be at the rate of two years' salary or remuneration to each of those officers, computed according to the amount paid for the year ending 31st December last. As a matter of fair play they were entitled to some compensation, and no one doubted the justice of their claims; but, unfortunately, the Rules and Standing Orders of the House threw some difficulty in the way, and they were thus prevented from having their just claims placed before the Committee to which the consideration of the Bill had been referred. That Committee had given the Bill great consideration; but, still, as these men could not come before them to establish their claims, it might be said it had not received all the consideration it deserved. It was clear that, had it not been for the energy displayed by the servants of the Newry and Armagh Company, the line would have been extinct many years ago. They had succeeded in bringing it to such a condition that the directors and shareholders were able to make a very profitable, or, at all events, a very fair bargain with the Great Northern Company; but he was given to understand that the directors of the Newry and Armagh Company, in apportioning the purchase-money, did not propose to give any of it in compensation to those who had been for some time past their honest servants, save in one instance—that of Mr. Fearnley, the secretary of the Newry and Armagh Railway, who was to get the small sum of one year's salary. The employés of the Newry and Armagh Company had not received any advances from the Great Northern Company to take them into their employment, nor had they had any consideration from their own directors. They would, therefore, be cast on the world without the means of earning their bread; and everybody knew that in these depressed times, especially in Ireland, it would be very difficult for these men to obtain employment similar to that in which they had hitherto been engaged. He believed that nearly every Railway Company in Ireland was well supplied with servants; and, therefore, did not require the men who were to be discharged from the Newry and Armagh Line. He thought it was a great hardship to them that they should, at what he might call a moment's notice, be thus thrown adrift upon the labour market, which, in Ireland, was overcrowded, so that it was hard for them to obtain fresh work. It was possible the Great Northern Company might give them something to do further on; but, in the meantime, they had sent in a petition to their own directors, but he regretted to say that the petition had not been favourably entertained. In all previous amalgamations the interests of the officers and servants of the disestablished Company had been considered; but, in this instance, the directors had virtually refused to give any compensation to their employés, and hence it was he moved the Amendment, in order to allow of the directors doing justly by their servants, and to obtain an expression of opinion on the part of the House, to the effect that justice had hardly been done to the claims of the employés. It did not follow that, because all of the employés might not have been a long time in the service, there were not a large number deserving of compensation for the loss of their position, and he could not see why they should be shut out from obtaining it.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 12, to leave out the words "if any."
—(Mr. Verner.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'if any' stand part of the Bill."

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID imagined that, as Chairman of the Committee which sat on the Bill upstairs, it became his duty to say that it would be wrong for the House to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. Verner). He understood, when the Bill for the amalgamation of the two undertakings was considered by the Referees, the servants of the smaller Company—the Newry and Armagh—which was, practically speaking, nearly bankrupt, petitioned to be allowed to appear before the Committee in order to endeavour to obtain compulsory compensation upon their discharge from the various offices they had held. Their locus standi was disallowed. Subsequently, application was made to him, as Chairman of the Committee, to insert in the Bill some such clause as the hon. Member had upon the Paper. It appeared to him, however, that, first of all, he would be going far beyond his province as Chairman in proposing, and, in the second place, that the Committee would go far beyond the practice of Committees in inserting, such a clause. Besides that, it also seemed to him that, upon general principles, such a proposal was objectionable, and that to have accepted it would have been to establish an injurious precedent. The hon. Member now proposed that every officer of the Newry and Armagh Company, whatever be the length of time he had been engaged in their service, should have compensation at the rate of two years' salary, besides six months' notice to quit. To lay down such a general principle upon a bare statement of facts like that just made by the hon. Gentleman would be to establish a very injurious precedent. He (Sir Julian Goldsmid) had made some inquiry on the subject, and he could not find any precedent for such action. The words in the clause of the Bill, as it now stood, were the correct ones—namely, that the Company should take over the business of the other Company, and—

“ Shall be liable for any retiring allowances and for any compensation, if any, which may be due to their officers and servants.”

He did not think they ought to say that the large compensation should be due which the hon. Member desired to establish. He was told that several servants had only been a few months in the employ of the Company, and these would come under the operation of the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman. He did not think the House of Commons would say that any such proceedings could possibly be allowed; and, therefore, he considered it his duty to ask the House to resist the Amendment.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE likewise regarded it his duty to object to the Amendment. There was no justice whatever in giving compensation to officers, when two railways were being amalgamated by their own consent. It was clearly to the advantage of the shareholders of the Newry and Armagh Company that they should be amalgamated; and, therefore, their servants had no claim upon the Great Northern Company.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he would not have risen to make any observations on the subject, had it not been for certain remarks made by the hon. Baronet (Sir Julian Goldsmid), who was Chairman of the Committee. The hon. Baronet had spoken of the Newry and Armagh Company as bankrupt. That was hardly borne out by the facts, seeing that the Great Northern was about to pay the shareholders £2 10s. per share, and pay off, at the rate of 20s. in the pound, all their debts and equitable liabilities. The hon. Baronet, who, no doubt, referred to the earlier difficulties of the Company, would not, he presumed, question this explanation, for if the Company was really insolvent the shareholders should not receive back any of their capital.

MR. RAIKES remarked, that the hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment (Mr. Verner) was good enough to call his (Mr. Raikes') attention to the matter yesterday. There could be no doubt that the House was always anxious that no servant should suffer in consequence of an amalgamation; yet, at the same time, the House well knew, from what had been said, that they would be departing from precedent if they were to accept the present Amendment. In the case of any public undertaking, which was purchased by, or amalgamated with, a large public corporation, provision was frequently made for compensation to the officers of the disestablished Company. But the present Bill contained a provision which was sufficiently strong in that respect, inasmuch as it was recited that any compensation or retiring allowances which were due should be paid by the Company which took over the smaller Company.

His hon. Friend, however, proposed that the House should specify the precise amount of that compensation. To adopt such a course would be very dangerous. Several of the officers might only, as the hon. Baronet (Sir Julian Goldsmid) had said, have been in the service of the Newry and Armagh Company for a very short time, and, therefore, were certainly not entitled to anything like the compensation proposed. That being so, he thought it would be desirable to leave the Company to do justice to the servants; and he was disposed to think that the Great Northern Company would act liberally, because he was given to understand that they had adopted a more liberal scale of compensation than was generally adopted. Under all the circumstances of the case, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment to a Division.

MR. DE LA POER BERESFORD thought that the servants of the Newry and Armagh Company had strong claims upon the directors of the Great Northern Company, and the directors themselves acknowledged this claim, because, in a clause in the Bill, they agree to pay all retiring allowances and compensation to their officers and servants. Speaking from his own experience, he could say that these men were most efficient; and, at the present time, it would be a very great and severe trial upon them to be turned out of their employment, which many of them had enjoyed for a considerable time. He had pleasure in supporting the Amendment.

MR. CALLAN said, that both in the interest of the Railway Company and the borough of Armagh, it was well that the Newry and Armagh Line should be amalgamated with the Great Northern. He would not advise the House to depart from precedent by adopting a proposal such as the present. He could hardly help thinking that the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. De La Poer Beresford) had the interest of his political supporters in that city at heart, in supporting the Amendment in the way he had.

MR. DE LA POER BERESFORD replied, that the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) was completely in error. Every one of those men voted against him at the last Election.

MR. BIGGAR opposed the Amendment. The Great Northern Company had given the full value for the railway, as awarded by the arbitrators, and why they should be asked, in addition, to pay compensation allowances to the servants, he could not conceive. He trusted the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Verner) would not put the House to the trouble of dividing. These men were sure to obtain employment if their services were of any value.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

DESPATCH No. 4 (LEGISLATIVE) INDIA
—OPINIONS UPON AND CORRESPONDENCE.—QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (for Sir DAVID WEDDERBURN) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, Copy of Despatch, No. 4 (Legislative), dated the 26th December 1878, together with the opinions of the local Governments and of the local officers, European and Native, to whom that Despatch was referred?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, that as soon as the Correspondence was complete there would be no objection whatever to lay it on the Table; and he would endeavour to make such a selection of Papers as would give full information upon the subject.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—TOWN INSPECTOR OF BELFAST.

QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he will give an assurance that upon the occurrence of a vacancy, well known to be imminent, in the Inspectorship of the Royal Irish Constabulary in Belfast, the principle of promotion of deserving officers within the force, recommended, with reference to its highest posts, by the Irish Constabulary Commission of 1866, will be adhered to, and the post given in accordance with the general usages of the force, to one of its officers?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, with regard to this supposed vacancy taking place, I stated the other day, in reply to a Question put to me by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), that I had received a communication from the officer referred to, in which he stated that he was quite restored to health, and he was happy to say he never felt better in his life; and I went on to express a hope that he would be spared for many years to the public service. I have no doubt proper steps will be taken to fill up a vacancy when it occurs; but I have no particular information with regard to it.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ASIATIC PROVINCES OF TURKEY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. BAXTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If, having regard to the decided language of the Marquess of Salisbury's Despatch, dated 8th August 1878, respecting the "measures of reform required specially for the Armenians," and the frequent complaints that have since been made of "abuses in government" and "mis-carriage of justice" from that part of Asia Minor in which they constitute by far the largest portion of the population, any recent correspondence has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Ottoman Porte with a view of giving effect to the provisions of the Treaty and Convention in this respect; and, whether it has been proposed to place the Armenians under some such administration as has worked so satisfactorily in the Lebanon?

MR. BOURKE: Yes, Sir, Correspondence has taken place, and is taking place, between Her Majesty's Government and the Porte, with the view referred to. In regard to the second part of the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to state that although two Commissions have been sent by the Porte to Asia Minor, one to Erzeroum and the other to the Vilayet of the Lebanon, with the view of inaugurating the new laws in that country, and also with the view of seeing whether the Organic Statute, which has been passed for Eastern Roumelia, could be brought into operation in that territory, yet it has not been proposed that the system of administration which has existed in the Lebanon for some years past—I think since 1862—should be introduced into the Asiatic Provinces of Turkey.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked, Whether any Papers on the subject of reforms in Turkey would be distributed within the next two or three days?

MR. BOURKE: Some Papers will be laid upon the Table this evening. They are very short; and I am not quite certain whether they can be said to apply to reforms in Turkey. They only, I believe, deal with one point.

METROPOLIS—EDUCATIONAL CHARITIES OF LONDON.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it would be possible to obtain the Report and Return of the Committee appointed by the London School Board on London Educational Charities, and to present it to the House and print it for the information of Parliament?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that he was not aware that there was any Report of the kind referred to by the hon. Gentleman, or that there was any Committee of the London School Board specially appointed to report on the Educational Charities of London; but there was a Standing Committee, which reported on the schemes of the Endowed Schools' Commissioners, and its Reports were accessible to every ratepayer of the Metropolis, so that there was no necessity to lay them on the Table.

POST OFFICE (CONTRACTS)—THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

QUESTIONS.

MR. RATHBONE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he can say when the Government propose to bring the Contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Company for conveyance of the Eastern Mails before the House?

MR. ISAAC asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When the Contracts provisionally entered into for the conveyance of Mails to India and China will be submitted to the House for confirmation?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he wished he could give a more definite assurance as to the day on which he hoped to be able to do what hon. Members required in their Questions; but in the present state of Business it was almost impossible to fix anything with certainty. He would put the matter down for Tuesday week, in the hope that he might be able to bring it on on that day.

NAVY — H.M.S. "WARRIOR."

QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, previous to the forthcoming discussion of the Navy Estimates, he has any objection to the iron model (18 inches by 10 inches) being exhibited, showing the actual construction of the "Warrior," together with the particulars thereunto appended, so that Members may have an opportunity of inspecting the same?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, he was not aware whether there was such a model, with the particulars mentioned; but there were several models in the Museum at Greenwich Hospital, which was open to the inspection of Members, to whom every facility would be afforded for seeing them. It would not be convenient to remove the models from a place where they were a constant object of study.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—EXAMINATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. BROWN asked the Secretary of State for War, Under what conditions successful candidates at the coming examination in August will enter the Army Medical Department; whether under the Warrant now in force, limiting their service to ten years, or under a new Warrant, which has been promised, but is not yet published?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, the usual Notice had been given. He hoped that by that time the new Warrant now under the consideration of the Treasury, and which in substance carried out a good many of the recommendations of the Medical Committee of last year, would have been issued; but if it were not, the examinations would be held under the old one.

POST OFFICE (CONTRACTS)—THE AUSTRALIAN MAILS.—QUESTION.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD asked the Postmaster General, Whether (inasmuch as forty-one to forty-two days are usually occupied in the transmission of letters to Melbourne by the means of conveyance adopted by the Post Office, while private Steam vessels have been known to perform the voyage in thirty-seven days) he can inform the House whether any and what steps are being taken to accelerate that mail service, in accordance with the prayer of various Memorials which have been addressed to the Department?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, when the new Contract between the Imperial Government and the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company and the new Contract concluded between the Government of Victoria and the same Company take effect, on the 1st of February next, there will be an acceleration of the mail service from England to Melbourne to the extent of fully five days. The time to be occupied between London and Point de Galle will be a little over 20 days, and the time to be occupied between Point de Galle and Melbourne will be 19 days, or in all 39 days.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH MARRIAGE LAWS.—QUESTION.

MR. HARDCASTLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the fact that marriages contracted in this country between French men and English women in accordance with English law, are, in the absence of certain elaborate formalities required by French law, the necessity for which is generally unknown in this Country, absolutely void in France; whether numerous instances have been recently brought under his notice in which English women so married, after living for years without doubt as to the legality of their marriage, have been abandoned by their husbands in France on the ground that their marriage was informal; and, whether, pending any diplomatic negotiation which may be undertaken for the amendment of the French law in this respect, he will issue instructions to persons qualified to perform marriages in this Country, in order that when notice is given of such intended marriages between French men and English women, both parties may be informed what are the requirements of the French law?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have no doubt that the first paragraph of the Question substantially states what the existing French law is; but my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Marquess of Salisbury) has promised to obtain absolutely correct information upon that point. With regard to the second paragraph of the Question, I am sorry to say there can be no doubt whatever that many most heart-rending cases have taken place precisely as therein described; and I should be very glad indeed to do anything in my power to prevent a recurrence of such cases. I shall consult with my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor as to what means can be taken for making the existing French law known. More than that, I do not think my hon. Friend can expect me at the present moment to say.

NAVY—NAVIGATING OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, inasmuch as additional pay is offered (by the Circular of 27th May, 1879) to executive officers who qualify for and perform navigating duties, it is intended to grant similar emoluments to the old navigating officers who have performed those duties for years past, so as to place the latter on an equality with executive officers in pay and position; and, if not, whether the Admiralty will offer some increased facilities to the old navigating officers to retire from a position which many of them felt to be humiliating?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, so far as pay is concerned, navigating lieutenants have an advantage over lieutenants on the executive list who undertake navigating duties. I entertain a high sense of the value of the services of the navigating officers of the Fleet, and I should be exceedingly sorry to hear that any of them supposed their position to be a humiliating one. I am not aware of any grounds for this feeling. As a matter of fact, the pay and position of these officers have been improved in recent years; but I do not see my way to offer additional inducements for retirement, as the existing scale is, in my judgment, a liberal one.

ARMY—THE 60TH RIFLES—CASE OF COLOUR SERGEANT DICKATY.

QUESTION.

MR. PRICE: I beg to ask the Judge Advocate General, with reference to the trial of Colour Sergeant Dickaty, of the 60th Rifles, under the 52nd Article of War, for shamefully abandoning his post, Whether the sentence of reduction to the ranks and five years' penal servitude which was passed upon him has been merely remitted, or whether the proceedings of the court martial have been quashed or set aside; whether the offence under which the prisoner was arraigned, and the sentence passed upon him, will be recorded against him in the regimental defaulter's book; whether it is to be understood that the prisoner is considered to be morally as well as legally innocent of the charge preferred against him; and, whether it is not really the fact that Colour Sergeant Dickaty behaved well under difficult circumstances?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: Sir, with reference to the first two parts of the Question, I have already explained to the hon. Member the action I have taken in this matter. The consequence is that the proceedings of the court martial are altogether set aside, and no record of the conviction will remain in the regimental defaulters' book, and thus the prisoner is in the same position as if he had never been tried. With reference to the last two parts, I yesterday informed the hon. Member that the evidence adduced at the trial did not appear to me to warrant the conviction; and I think that, according to official and Parliamentary usages, I cannot be called upon to give him any further opinion. The proceedings of the court martial are now in my custody, and are open to the inspection of the hon. Member, or of any other hon. Member of the House.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE QUEEN v. CASTRO.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, considering that evidence has been brought to his notice since the conviction of the claimant to the Tichborne estates in February 1874, and the fact that, according to usage, the sentence passed upon him for swearing that he was not Arthur Orton would expire on the 10th of August next; considering also the grave legal doubts that the Court had power to give more than one sentence for a supposed perjury, and that the jurhave made certain statements as to the circumstances under which they found their verdict, he would advise Her Majesty to liberate the prisoner on the 10th of August next; and, if not, whether he will forthwith investigate the numerous matters to which his attention has been called in support of the identity of the claimant with Roger Tichborne; whether the Officers of the Treasury have made any report to the Home Secretary regarding the evidence of Captain Barry, of New Zealand; whether he will lay upon the Table of the House any Reports from the different governors of the various prisons in which the claimant has been confined tending to show that he cannot be Arthur Orton; whether it is true that Her Majesty's Ministers, or any of them, advised the Queen to send a telegram of sympathy to Lady Radcliffe, congratulating her upon the result of the trial; and, whether, as a matter of fact, the trial of the claimant has not cost the country more than a quarter of a million of money?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I am afraid that my answer will not give more satisfaction to the hon. Gentleman than some of my previous ones; but I will answer the Question to the best of my ability. I see that he refers to grave legal doubts; but what they are is not quite clear from the terms of the Question. The legality of the sentence, I apprehend, is not a matter for the Secretary of State to try. The prisoner is in custody under a sentence of a Court of Justice, and unless that sentence is set aside by a competent authority, it is the duty of the Secretary of State to see that it is carried out, unless there are reasons to the contrary on other grounds. I can see no reason at the present moment, having carefully considered all the matters laid before me relating to the case in question, to alter the decision I originally came to. I have stated in the House, more than once, that it is not my intention to interfere with the execution and carrying out of that sentence. The Solicitor to the Treasury has had all the Papers relating to Captain Barry, and I am advised by him that there is no reason why any action should be taken by me with respect to these Papers. I am not aware whether any Reports have been received from the governors of prisons tending to show that the prisoner is not Arthur Orton. There are a great mass of Papers which I directed to be searched to-day; but nothing of the kind has been discovered in them, and that is the only information that I have received. I am not aware that any of Her Majesty's Ministers advised the Queen to send a telegram of sympathy to Lady Radcliffe, or to anyone else connected with this case. With regard to the last part of the Question, I must refer the hon. Member to the Secretary to the Treasury, who has been asked about the expense on several occasions. It does not come within my Department.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE LATEST TELEGRAM.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish, Sir, to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can give the House any information in regard to the peace negotiations in South Africa, beyond that which he gave very late last night; and, also, whether he has had his attention drawn to the statement in The Daily Telegraph of this morning, that Sir Garnet Wolseley had interfered with, or, it may be said, overruled, the action of Lord Chelmsford in regard to these negotiations?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Yes, Sir, I am now in a position to give the House fuller information than I could give this morning, in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). It appears, from the telegrams I will read, that Sir Garnet Wolseley has taken a somewhat different course with regard to communications from Cetywayo to that taken by Lord Chelmsford. [For Telegrams, see ante pp. 731-732.]

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT—SPECIAL POLICE TAXES.

QUESTIONS.

MAJOR NOLAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If certain properties have been exempted from the police tax imposed on districts in Connemara, and, if so, have these exemptions tended to raise the tax levied on other proprietors and tenants?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The object which it is sought to attain by the imposition of a special police tax is to reach through their pockets those persons who are the aiders and abettors of, or sympathizers with, the outrages which have made it necessary to employ an additional force. In instances, however, in which it is manifest that no complicity or sympathy exists, such, for instance, as in the case of persons who have been themselves the object of attack or threats, it is usual to grant exemptions. In reference to the particular case of Connemara, some slight exemptions have been made in the direction I have indicated. Such exemptions made since the imposition of the tax will not increase its incidence in the case of the other parties who are liable, though it would be otherwise if the levy had not been already made. Two extra drafts of police have been charged for; two others will not be charged for, unless further outrage occurs.

MR. PARNELL wished to know by what means the right hon. Gentleman ascertained that certain occupiers were wholly guiltless, and that certain others were not guilty for the purposes of the tax?

MR. BIGGAR also wished to inquire in what way the right hon. Gentleman discovered who were sympathizers and who were not?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The question of the hon. Gentlemen has inverted the order of things. I would observe that the exemptions were the exception and the imposition of the tax the rule. In certain cases, where it is manifest that parties are not in any way responsible—as, for instance, the objects of attack, and others in the same category—they are exempted from contributing to the tax. The exemptions, I will add, are made on the report of the authorities employed in the locality.

MR. CALLAN asked, under what Act the Government was authorized to make exemptions, and also whether Grand Juries had any power in the matter?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, that the exemptions were made under the Peace Preservation Act; but he was not prepared to give the section.

PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—STATEMENT.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to make an appeal to those hon. Gentlemen who had Motions on the Paper for the Evening

Mr. J. Lowther

Sitting. The Business of the afternoon was the consideration of the Report of Amendment on the Army Discipline Bill. In the event of that not being concluded by 7 o'clock, he should be glad if hon. Gentlemen would postpone the Motions of which they had given Notice, so as to allow the present stage of the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill to be completed in the evening. If hon. Members would accede to this appeal, it might not be necessary to ask the House to sit on Saturday; otherwise, they might be under the necessity of making that request.

MR. CALLAN said, he was the only Member present who had a Notice on the Paper. He was bound to say that, with every desire to assist the progress of Public Business, he would not feel it to be his duty to yield to the present request, unless the Government placed him in an equally favourable position for bringing the subject forward on some future occasion. The subject which stood in his name with reference to the release of Theodoridi was an important one, and one in regard to which he had three times unsuccessfully balloted for a place.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—[BILL 245.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

FURTHER PROCEEDING ON CONSIDERATION AS AMENDED [17th July.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to the Bill [17th July] (on Consideration, as amended); and which Amendment was, in page 2, line 19, to insert, after the word "enemy," the words "in such manner as to show cowardice."—(Colonel Stanley.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Debate resumed.

MR. E. JENKINS strongly objected to any addition to the offences liable to the death penalty. Those who objected to flogging would resist to the utmost any attempt to increase or to widen any of the offences now liable to that punishment. He would like to know what motive the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had in proposing this vague Amendment?

COLONEL STANLEY explained, that in military parlance misbehaving meant showing cowardice before the enemy; but, lest it should be taken in a more extensive sense, he proposed to limit it by inserting the explanatory words of the Amendment. Instead of extending the punishment of death, as the hon. Member supposed, it would go in the direction of further limiting its infliction.

MR. O'DONNELL objected to the Amendment, and to the punishment of death being inflicted for an offence so vaguely described as "cowardice." He thought the Amendment should be amended, so as to show that cowardice would only be punished where it was demonstrated in some unmistakable manner. Imputations of individual cowardice were easy to be made when a scapegoat was wanted, and a mere act of inadvertence might be mistaken for cowardice. By the German Military Code, before a soldier could be convicted of the crime in question, he must have "shown cowardice by words or signs to induce his comrades to take flight."

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, he would remind the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) that a soldier could not be convicted of cowardice until after full inquiry by a court martial, and it might fairly be left to that tribunal to determine whether the particular offence of cowardice was deserving of punishment by death or otherwise. The cowardice contemplated by the Amendment was evidently such as would be committed in the face of the enemy, and no one could doubt that it was the worst possible offence a soldier could commit.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. PARNELL rose to move the omission of sub-section 7 from the clause, making this offence punishable with death.

MR. SPEAKER thereupon pointed out to the hon. Member that he could not do so. They had already dealt with the portion of the section to which the hon. Member referred, so far as to authorize the insertion of the words, "in such manner as to show cowardice." The sub-section must, therefore, stand, and could not be left out.

MR. PARNELL said, he would have moved to omit several of the sub-sections; but after the adoption of the Resolution last night, he could only now, by the Rules of the House, attempt to modify them. He objected to making soldiers brave by the lash; and, for his own part, he believed that if a soldier preferred flogging to death, it would be that he might have the opportunity of shooting the officer who ordered it. He would move an Amendment to the clause to limit still further its operation, by the addition of the words, "by words or signs inducing his comrades to take flight," to the sub-section. He considered it was very desirable that some such words should be inserted, for he protested against the folly of shooting a young soldier who happened to show nervousness in his first battle, and who would soon get over it. He recollected that when he first addressed the House he felt very considerable nervousness. People's nerves were not always the same; but they were the most uncontrollable portions of physiology, and punishment ought not to be inflicted for what, after all, might be a matter of physical and nervous infirmity, as to which it was not in the power of a man to control his action. In submitting the Amendment, he was only following the analogy of the German Military Code. The hon. Member concluded his remarks without moving the Amendment to which he had referred, whereupon,

MR. SPEAKER said, there was no Question now before the House. The hon. Member for Meath had said that he intended to conclude with an Amendment, but had sat down without doing so. By taking that course, he (Mr. Speaker) considered the hon. Member had shown great disrespect to the House.

MR. PARNELL (coming up to the Chair with his Amendment): I beg to say, Sir, that when I rose I read out my Amendment, "by words or signs inducing his comrades to take flight." I supposed that, in doing so, I had done all that was necessary in moving it; but, of course, if I am wrong—for I am not much experienced in the proceedings of this House on Report of Committees—I shall, in future, comply with the Form, and endeavour not to make a similar mistake again. I can only say that I had no intention of showing any disrespect whatever.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words "by words or signs inducing his comrades to take flight."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY, in opposing the Amendment, said, that all matters connected with the offence contemplated by the sub-section would have to be proved upon evidence before a court martial, and it might safely be left to the discretion of that tribunal to deal with them properly.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. O'DONNELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 20, to insert, after the word "death," the following words:—

"Provided, That in the case of persons charged under sections two, six, and seven, serious loss to Her Majesty's forces has been proved to have been the consequence of this act."

His object was to limit the number of offences involving the penalty of death, which, under the clause, appeared to him to be of too general application. In moving the Amendment, he was only asking the House to follow the provisions of the German Military Code. In his opinion, leaving out of view altogether the powers it gave for flogging, the Military Code of England was the most bloody and barbarous in Europe; and he was, therefore, obliged to be very determined in his opposition to it, especially as some persons had attributed inhumanity to him and those with whom he had the honour to act. For himself, however, he must say that he denied in toto the imputation that he was less humane than any other hon. Member. He would conclude by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 20, after the word "death," to insert the words "Provided, That in the case of persons charged under sections two, six, and seven, serious loss to Her Majesty's forces has been proved to have been the consequence of this act."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he could not accept the Amendment, which laid down the principle that the heinousness of the offence should be measured by its consequences—a principle which was entirely foreign to the discipline of the English Army.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME also opposed the Amendment, and remarked that the idea of proposing it could only have originated in a general ignorance on the part of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) of military matters and the exigencies of discipline. He (Captain Milne-Home) considered the argument of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War conclusive upon the point.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR, in supporting the Amendment, said, that within the last day or two he had had an opportunity of speaking to a distinguished German officer, the Military Attaché at the German Embassy, who was in charge of a corps d'armées of 36,000 men during the whole of the Franco-German War, and who informed him that not a single German soldier in that corps had been shot for any offence whatever. He also stated that other Generals who held similar positions had had the same experience; so that in several corps d'armée, numbering between 100,000 and 200,000 men, it had not been found necessary to inflict death in a single instance. The same circumstance existed in connection with the French Armies; and he should, therefore, like to know why the same motives which guided and restrained Frenchmen, Germans, and Americans, should not control Englishmen in the Army? To say they would not was an aspersion upon our nation and Army. Why not, he asked, inflict flogging upon officers as well as men?

MR. SPEAKER desired the hon. Baronet to confine himself directly to the Amendment. The question of flogging was not before the House.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR said, he had conceived that flogging was so mixed up with the death penalty that it might refer to it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER rose to Order, and said, that if the hon. Baronet was going to dispute Mr. Speaker's ruling, he apprehended Mr. Speaker would desire to submit the matter to the House.

MR. PARNELL denied that the hon. Baronet had contested Mr. Speaker's ruling.

MR. SPEAKER: I invited the hon. Member to apply himself to the Amendment before the House, and if he will do so there will be no interposition on my part.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR willingly bowed to Mr. Speaker's ruling, and though he had intended to address several observations to the House on the subject of flogging he would refrain from doing so. He supported the Amendment.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asserted that though soldiers in Germany and France were not ordered by courts martial to suffer corporal punishment, they were often thoroughly well flogged and licked on active service.

MR. RYLANDS thought that if they were ever to get through the Session they must refrain from re-opening the discussion upon flogging. Indeed, after the decision last evening, no other course was open to them. He could not support the Amendment, because it limited to a great extent the action of Commanders in time of war.

MR. PARNELL said, when in Committee, he withdrew his Amendments limiting the cases in which flogging could be inflicted, on the distinct assurance that he would be able to discuss them when the Report was under consideration to-day. If the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) was satisfied with the victory of the Liberal Party last night, all he (Mr. Parnell) could say was, he sympathized with him.

MR. H. SAMUELSON could not regard the Amendment in any other light than as being opposed to equity and justice.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Offences in relation to the enemy not punishable with death).

MR. PARNELL moved, as an Amendment, to omit sub-section 5, under which, he said, it would be possible for a court martial to sentence a newspaper correspondent to penal servitude for anything he wrote home to his newspaper. He could not imagine how any newspaper correspondent could, while this sub-section was maintained, perform his duty properly. He would be entirely at the beck and nod of any Commander, who might summon him before a court martial for anything that he wrote, and he might be sent to penal servitude.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 35, to leave out sub-section 5 of Clause 5. — (Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That sub-section 5 stand part of the Bill."

COLONEL STANLEY made no reply.

MR. BIGGAR asked why the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was silent as to the views of the Government upon the question? For himself, he could see no reason for not accepting the Amendment.

MR. H. SAMUELSON suggested that the word "wilfully" should be introduced after the word "writing," in order that a man might not be punished for writing in innocence and without any wilful intent.

MR. SULLIVAN thought some words should be inserted, in order that protection should be afforded to newspaper correspondents against the irascibility of commanders whose conduct they might have criticized. Under the clause, the correspondent of The Daily News in South Africa might be brought under the action of a court martial. Newspaper correspondence was beneficial to the public, and he objected entirely to the action of this clause. He hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would state the views of the Government on the Amendment.

MR. RYLANDS hoped the clause would be modified, so as not to include newspaper correspondents. Occasionally, they could not help "spreading reports calculated to occasion alarm and despondency," and for that they might be subjected to severe punishment.

MR. CALLAN, on the other hand, hoped the Government would not accept the Amendment. He had no sympathy with sensational war correspondence. With all due respect for the great services rendered by Dr. Russell and other equally celebrated correspondents during late wars, he thought there were far superior considerations to the conventional respect paid to the newspaper correspondents at the seat of war. Commanders should have power to deter correspondents from writing sensational reports to increase the circulation of the papers rather than give true information. He wished, further, to point out that great injury had been done to the French cause during the Franco-German War in consequence of correspondents spreading reports calculated to cause unnecessary alarm.

COLONEL STANLEY said, it would not be right to strike out the sub-section; neither did he think these words were unduly harsh in an Article of War which had existed for a long time. Nothing could have been more unfavourable than reports sent home, at various times, from persons with the Army on foreign service; and the authorities had not exhibited any desire to take action, unless the effect of the reports was to produce alarm or despondency among the troops. If a man went about among them, saying—"We have got no supplies; they are thinking nothing about us at home; why don't you desert?"—there could hardly be a question but that he should be liable to severe punishment. Why was he to be exempted from the consequences merely because he put it in writing? The law had always been read and acted upon in the light of common sense. A man would be liable to punishment only on conviction by a court martial composed of officers who were gentlemen, and were sworn to try the facts. However strong the words might be, he did not believe that any practical application of them would be found to be unduly harsh.

MR. E. JENKINS urged that newspaper correspondents were now for the first time brought under military law, and pointed out that the old Mutiny Act had not referred to newspaper correspondents, and that the spreading of alarming reports which was made punishable under the old Act meant the spreading of these reports in the Army itself. Nothing should be done to restrain free and honest criticism of the operations of an Army and the conduct of its Generals in letters sent to journals at home. There was all the difference between the conduct described by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War and the writing of such letters as Dr. Russell sent from the Crimea. Although those letters did undoubtedly create alarm and despondency at the time, yet he would remind the House that they ultimately led to great and much-needed reforms. The words, he thought, should be—"create alarm and despondency in the Army."

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR said, as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War seemed only to be afraid of the despondency which might be created amongst the soldiers, he would propose that the words, "amongst the troops in the field," be inserted in the section.

MR. PARNELL said, that his proposal to omit the sub-section was, perhaps, too sweeping, and, in order to allow the Amendment just suggested to be moved, he would ask leave to withdraw the Motion. [Cries of "No, no!"]

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR again rose to make some remarks, when

MR. SPEAKER ruled that he could not do so, as he had already addressed the House.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 223; Noes 42: Majority 181.—(Div. List, No. 174.)

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR moved, as an Amendment, to add to the sub-section the following rider, after the word "or" — "insubordination: Provided such reports are wilfully spread among the troops in the field."

MR. SULLIVAN seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 37, to insert, after the word "or," the words "insubordination: Provided such reports are wilfully spread among troops in the field."—(Sir Tollemache Sinclair.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY said, the words proposed were not free from objection. This section had existed for a considerable time in the old Act, and it had never been found to operate prejudicially. Its wording showed that it could not apply to newspaper correspondents.

MAJOR NOLAN observed, that the fact that this provision had existed for some time could hardly be, because, on referring to the old Act, he found that the words "in the vicinity or rear of the Army" were in the clause, and this continued certainly as late as 1871. Correspondents did not publish their letters in the vicinity or rear of the Army.

MR. E. JENKINS thought the Government might agree to put in these words, which formerly were in the old Act. The creation of alarm and despondency at home was never intended to be punished by the Mutiny Act. Newspaper articles from South Africa might have great effect in this country, but could have none on the Army there.

MR. ANDERSON observed, that this clause, as it stood, seemed intended to catch newspaper correspondents. He should like to know, if that provision had been in existence, what would have happened to the correspondent of The Standard with General Roberts in the Khast Valley? Instead of sending him to the rear, they would have tried him by court martial and given him penal servitude. All that that correspondent was doing was informing the people of this country of the barbarous and cruel manner in which that officer was destroying peaceful villages in the country which the British troops had invaded, and through which they were carrying fire and sword, and behaving altogether in a manner opposed to the principles of civilized warfare. This newspaper correspondent did no more than tell the people of this country of the manner in which the war was going on. But in the future the British public must expect no impartial accounts, nothing but what a commanding officer might allow.

Question put.

MR. SULLIVAN, in moving the insertion, in line 37, of a Proviso limiting the operation of the sub-section to cases in which the offence consisted in spreading reports calculated to create despondency, alarm, or "desertion in the vicinity or in the rear of the Army" said, the words were taken from the Article of War upon which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War declared the sub-section to have been based. Without the addition of the words which he desired to see inserted, the clause would enable an officer to interfere when interference was not required with a member of the Press in the legitimate exercise of his duties.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 37, to insert, after the word "or," the words "desertion: Provided, That the offence consists in spreading such reports in the vicinity or rear of the Army."—(Mr. Sullivan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL supported the Amendment. He hoped the Government would give way, seeing that the Amendment merely maintained the present law and practice.

MR. O'DONNELL hoped the House would stand firm and resist to the last the ill-concealed object of the Government to terrorize over the Press.

COLONEL STANLEY asked the House to reject the Amendment, which was exactly similar to the one which had just been negatived by the House. It should be observed that the Article of War upon which the clause was based did not require that the reports should be spread upon active service, whereas the clause before the House related only to cases occurring on such service.

MR. E. JENKINS approved the Amendment. The clause, as it stood, would disadvantageously affect the position of newspaper correspondents. Those gentlemen had often done good service by exposing the rottenness of the Army, and they ought not to be brought within the operations of the clause.

MAJOR NOLAN regarded the clause as directed against newspaper correspondents.

SIR HENRY JAMES deprecated the discussion, as going again over ground which had already been discussed in Committee. The clause would put newspaper correspondents in no worse position than they would be placed in by the Articles of War. They were formerly under the arbitrary power of the Commander of the Forces in the field. This Bill protected them by its definite provisions; and it was, therefore, necessary there should be some equivalent provision against their abusing their position, and doing harm to the Army.

MR. RYLANDS thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had failed to show

Form, and endeavour not to make a similar mistake again. I can only say that I had no intention of showing any disrespect whatever.

[The hon. Member then handed his Amendment to Mr. Speaker, saying that, if in Order, he now formally moved it.]

Amendment proposed, at the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words "by words or signs inducing his comrades to take flight."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY, in opposing the Amendment, said, that all matters connected with the offence contemplated by the sub-section would have to be proved upon evidence before a court martial, and it might safely be left to the discretion of that tribunal to deal with them properly.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. O'DONNELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 20, to insert, after the word "death," the following words:—

"Provided, That in the case of persons charged under sections two, six, and seven, serious loss to Her Majesty's forces has been proved to have been the consequence of this act."

His object was to limit the number of offences involving the penalty of death, which, under the clause, appeared to him to be of too general application. In moving the Amendment, he was only asking the House to follow the provisions of the German Military Code. In his opinion, leaving out of view altogether the powers it gave for flogging, the Military Code of England was the most bloody and barbarous in Europe; and he was, therefore, obliged to be very determined in his opposition to it, especially as some persons had attributed inhumanity to him and those with whom he had the honour to act. For himself, however, he must say that he denied in toto the imputation that he was less humane than any other hon. Member. He would conclude by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 20, after the word "death," to insert the words "Provided, That in the case of persons charged under sections two, six, and

seven, serious loss to Her Majesty's forces has been proved to have been the consequence of this act."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he could not accept the Amendment, which laid down the principle that the heinousness of the offence should be measured by its consequences—a principle which was entirely foreign to the discipline of the English Army.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME also opposed the Amendment, and remarked that the idea of proposing it could only have originated in a general ignorance on the part of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) of military matters and the exigencies of discipline. He (Captain Milne-Home) considered the argument of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War conclusive upon the point.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR, in supporting the Amendment, said, that within the last day or two he had had an opportunity of speaking to a distinguished German officer, the Military Attaché at the German Embassy, who was in charge of a corps d'armées of 36,000 men during the whole of the Franco-German War, and who informed him that not a single German soldier in that corps had been shot for any offence whatever. He also stated that other Generals who held similar positions had had the same experience; so that in several corps d'armées, numbering between 100,000 and 200,000 men, it had not been found necessary to inflict death in a single instance. The same circumstances existed in connection with the French Armies; and he should, therefore, like to know why the same motives which guided and restrained Frenchmen, Germans, and Americans, should not control Englishmen in the Army? To say they would not was an aspersion upon our nation and Army. Why not, he asked, inflict flogging upon officers as well as men?

MR. SPEAKER desired the hon. Baronet to confine himself directly to the Amendment. The question of flogging was not before the House.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR said, he had conceived that flogging was so mixed up with the death penalty that it might refer to it.

ring to the old Act, he found that the words "in the vicinity or rear of the Army" were in the clause, and this continued certainly as late as 1871. Correspondents did not publish their letters in the vicinity or rear of the Army.

MR. E. JENKINS thought the Government might agree to put in these words, which formerly were in the old Act. The creation of alarm and despondency at home was never intended to be punished by the Mutiny Act. Newspaper articles from South Africa might have great effect in this country, but could have none on the Army there.

MR. ANDERSON observed, that this clause, as it stood, seemed intended to catch newspaper correspondents. He should like to know, if that provision had been in existence, what would have happened to the correspondent of The Standard with General Roberts in the Khost Valley? Instead of sending him to the rear, they would have tried him by court martial and given him penal servitude. All that that correspondent was doing was informing the people of this country of the barbarous and cruel manner in which that officer was destroying peaceful villages in the country which the British troops had invaded, and through which they were carrying fire and sword, and behaving altogether in a manner opposed to the principles of civilized warfare. This newspaper correspondent did no more than tell the people of this country of the manner in which the war was going on. But in the future the British public must expect no impartial accounts, nothing but what a commanding officer might allow.

Question put.

MR. SULLIVAN, in moving the insertion, in line 37, of a Proviso limiting the operation of the sub-section to cases in which the offence consisted in spreading reports calculated to create despondency, alarm, or "desertion in the vicinity or in the rear of the Army" said, the words were taken from the Article of War upon which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War declared the sub-section to have been based. Without the addition of the words which he desired to see inserted, the clause would enable an officer to interfere when interference was not required with a member of the Press in the legitimate exercise of his duties.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 37, to insert, after the word "or," the words "desertion: Provided, That the offence consists in spreading such reports in the vicinity or rear of the Army."—(Mr. Sullivan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL supported the Amendment. He hoped the Government would give way, seeing that the Amendment merely maintained the present law and practice.

MR. O'DONNELL hoped the House would stand firm and resist to the last the ill-concealed object of the Government to terrorize over the Press.

COLONEL STANLEY asked the House to reject the Amendment, which was exactly similar to the one which had just been negatived by the House. It should be observed that the Article of War upon which the clause was based did not require that the reports should be spread upon active service, whereas the clause before the House related only to cases occurring on such service.

MR. E. JENKINS approved the Amendment. The clause, as it stood, would disadvantageously affect the position of newspaper correspondents. Those gentlemen had often done good service by exposing the rottenness of the Army, and they ought not to be brought within the operations of the clause.

MAJOR NOLAN regarded the clause as directed against newspaper correspondents.

SIR HENRY JAMES deprecated the discussion, as going again over ground which had already been discussed in Committee. The clause would put newspaper correspondents in no worse position than they would be placed in by the Articles of War. They were formerly under the arbitrary power of the Commander of the Forces in the field. This Bill protected them by its definite provisions; and it was, therefore, necessary there should be some equivalent provision against their abusing their position, and doing harm to the Army.

MR. RYLANDS thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had failed to show late wars, he thought there were far superior considerations to the conventional respect paid to the newspaper correspondents at the seat of war. Commanders should have power to deter correspondents from writing sensational reports to increase the circulation of the papers rather than give true information. He wished, further, to point out that great injury had been done to the French cause during the Franco-German War in consequence of correspondents spreading reports calculated to cause unnecessary alarm.

COLONEL STANLEY said, it would not be right to strike out the sub-section; neither did he think these words were unduly harsh in an Article of War which had existed for a long time. Nothing could have been more unfavourable than reports sent home, at various times, from persons with the Army on foreign service; and the authorities had not exhibited any desire to take action, unless the effect of the reports was to produce alarm or despondency among the troops. If a man went about among them, saying—"We have got no supplies; they are thinking nothing about us at home; why don't you desert?"—there could hardly be a question but that he should be liable to severe punishment. Why was he to be exempted from the consequences merely because he put it in writing? The law had always been read and acted upon in the light of common sense. A man would be liable to punishment only on conviction by a court martial composed of officers who were gentlemen, and were sworn to try the facts. However strong the words might be, he did not believe that any practical application of them would be found to be unduly harsh.

MR. E. JENKINS urged that newspaper correspondents were now for the first time brought under military law, and pointed out that the old Mutiny Act had not referred to newspaper correspondents, and that the spreading of alarming reports which was made punishable under the old Act meant the spreading of these reports in the Army itself. Nothing should be done to restrain free and honest criticism of the operations of an Army and the conduct of its Generals in letters sent to journals at home. There was all the difference between the conduct described by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War and the writing of such letters as Dr. Russell sent from the Crimea. Although those letters did undoubtedly create alarm and despondency at the time, yet he would remind the House that they ultimately led to great and much-needed reforms. The words, he thought, should be—"create alarm and despondency in the Army."

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR said, as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War seemed only to be afraid of the despondency which might be created amongst the soldiers, he would propose that the words, "amongst the troops in the field," be inserted in the section.

MR. PARNELL said, that his proposal to omit the sub-section was, perhaps, too sweeping, and, in order to allow the Amendment just suggested to be moved, he would ask leave to withdraw the Motion. [Cries of "No, no!"]

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR again rose to make some remarks, when

MR. SPEAKER ruled that he could not do so, as he had already addressed the House.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 223; Noes 42: Majority 181.—(Div. List, No. 174.)

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR moved, as an Amendment, to add to the sub-section the following rider, after the word "or" — "insubordination: Provided such reports are wilfully spread among the troops in the field."

MR. SULLIVAN seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 37, to insert, after the word "or," the words "insubordination: Provided such reports are wilfully spread among troops in the field."—(Sir Tollemache Sinclair.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY said, the words proposed were not free from objection. This section had existed for a considerable time in the old Act, and it had never been found to operate prejudicially. Its wording showed that it could not apply to newspaper correspondents.

MAJOR NOLAN observed, that the fact that this provision had existed for some time could hardly be, because, on referring to the old Act, he found that the words "in the vicinity or rear of the Army" were in the clause, and this continued certainly as late as 1871. Correspondents did not publish their letters in the vicinity or rear of the Army.

MR. E. JENKINS thought the Government might agree to put in these words, which formerly were in the old Act. This Bill protected them by its definite provisions; and it was, therefore, necessary there should be some equivalent provision against their abusing their position, and doing harm to the Army.

MR. RYLANDS thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had failed to show any reasonable ground for altering the old Articles of War in regard to newspaper correspondents. Without some proviso, such as the one under notice, their position would be seriously affected.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR said, the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) seemed to forget that some of these newspaper correspondents were officers serving in the Army.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 59; Noes 231: Majority 172.—(Div. List, No. 176.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Offences punishable more severely on active service than at other times).

MR. O'DONNELL moved, in page 3, line 2, to leave out sub-section 1, by which the punishment of death was incurred by any soldier who, in search of plunder, left his commanding officer. In the German Army, the punishment for that offence was three years' imprisonment, and yet the German Military Code was the severest in Europe. He did not mean to say that he would divide the House, for he did not want to waste time — [Laughter] — but he was prepared to challenge, by way of protest, every case in which this Bill proposed a severer punishment than was contained in the German Code for the same offence.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 2, to leave out sub-section 1 of Clause 6.—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question proposed, "That sub-section 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. BIGGAR, in seconding the Amendment, asked how it was to be proved that a man left his commanding officer in search of plunder? The proposition of the Government was utterly unreasonable, and, therefore, he supported the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. O'DONNELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 4, to leave out sub-section 2, by which a soldier was liable to the punishment of death if, without the orders of his superior officer, he left his guard, picket, patrol, or post. In the German Code these offences were punished with various kinds of arrest, or, at the outside, with two years imprisonment, unless where some distinct damage to the Army was the result.

Question proposed, "That sub-section 2 stand part of the Bill."

MR. SULLIVAN supported the Amendment. His hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had said that he was indisposed to take up the time of the House in dividing upon these matters. [Laughter, and cries of "Oh!"] If that was the way in which the announcement of the hon. Member was to be received—the announcement that he would endeavour to facilitate the Business of the House, by not taking Divisions, but by recording his protest against the death sentence—he himself would challenge the proposition of the Government in a matter so perfectly reasonable, so that, at any rate, there might be a record of the names.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 245; Noes 17: Majority 228.—(Div. List, No. 177.)

MR. O'DONNELL moved, in page 3, line 8, the omission of sub-section 5, imposing the death or lesser penalty for impeding or refusing to assist the provost marshal or any officer in the execution of his duty. He remarked that under the sub-section a man might be shot for refusing to flog a comrade who might be his own brother.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 8, to leave out sub-section 5 of Clause 6.—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question put, "That sub-section 5 stand part of the Bill."

The House divided: — Ayes 233; Noes 16: Majority 217.—(Div. List, No. 178.)

MR. O'DONNELL, in moving, in page 3, line 12, to omit sub-section 6, making it an offence to do violence to a person bringing supplies, or injury to the property or person of a resident in the country, said he did so to show that those with whom he was acting did not prefer the bullet to the lash, as had been asserted. When these death clauses had been disposed of, he would make no further objection to the progress of the Bill, except on Clause 44. These offences were not in the German Code; and though, undoubtedly, it contained many offences deserving death, the phraseology of the sub-section was so large and so vague that all degrees of offences might be included in it, and the effect might be that persons guilty of the minor degrees might not be actually shot, but under the terms of the section could be shot, and, of course, could be flogged. He would prove that the majority was a shooting majority as well as a flogging majority, and he would confine his protests to offences visited with the death penalty.

Question proposed, "That sub-section 6 stand part of the Bill."

MR. PARNELL taunted the Government with having a majority as favourable to the bullet as the lash.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 229; Noes 12: Majority 217.—(Div. List, No. 179.)

MR. O'DONNELL moved the omission, in page 3, line 16, of sub-section 6, of the words "breaks into any house or other place in search of plunder." He did so because it was very wide in its terms and would easily expose a man to be flogged, if not to be shot. He contended that the Government should more clearly define what were the offences intended to be included under the sub-section. The punishment for this offence, unaggravated by any other circumstances, was imprisonment under the German Code.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 16, to leave out sub-section 7 of Clause 6.—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question put, "That sub-section 7 stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 211; Noes 10: Majority 201.—(Div. List, No. 180.)

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, further Consideration of the Bill, as amended, stood adjourned till this day.

It being five minutes to Seven of the clock, House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER appealed to the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert), who had a Motion on the Paper for the Amendment of the Married Women's Property Acts, 1870 and 1874, and other hon. Members who had Motions on the Paper, to refrain from bringing them forward, so that progress should be made with the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, which it was of great importance should be concluded that evening, or, at the latest, on the following day.

MR. HIBBERT said, that he was left in a position of some difficulty, for he had balloted ever since Easter without being able to bring forward until now his Motion with respect to the grievances which married women lay under with regard to their property, for under the Acts of 1870 and 1874 there had arisen so many cases that he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would see the necessity for amending the law. He (Mr. Hibbert) would give way now, feeling the difficulty of the Government; but he hoped the Government would next Session give him an opportunity of bringing forward his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—[BILL 245.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

FURTHER PROCEEDING ON CONSIDERATION AS AMENDED. [18th July.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

Clause 6 (Offences punishable more severely on active service than at other times).

COLONEL STANLEY moved an Amendment, in page 3, line 39, at end of clause, rendering an officer convicted by court martial liable to be cashiered, and a soldier to imprisonment, for committing any of the following offences:—

“Discharging firearms, drawing swords, beating drums, making signals, using words, or by any means whatever, negligently occasions false alarms in action, on the march, in the field, or elsewhere; or (2) makes known the parole or watchword to any person not entitled to receive it; or, without good and sufficient cause, gives a parole or watchword different from what he received.”

The right hon. and gallant Gentleman explained that he proposed the Amendment in pursuance of an undertaking given by him in Committee.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 39, at the end of Clause 6, to insert the words “Every person subject to military law who commits any of the following offences (that is to say):—

- (1.) By discharging firearms, drawing swords, beating drums, making signals, using words, or by any means whatever, negligently occasions false alarms in action, on the march, in the field, or elsewhere; or
- (2.) Makes known the parole or watchword to any person not entitled to receive it; or, without good or sufficient cause, gives a parole or watchword different from what he received, shall on conviction by court martial be liable, if an officer, to be cashiered, or to suffer such less punishment as is in this Act mentioned, and if a soldier, to suffer imprisonment, on such less punishment as is in this Act mentioned.”—(Colonel Stanley.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. PARNELL, believing that it was not fair to inflict imprisonment with hard labour for the offence of negligence simply, moved to amend the proposed Amendment by adding the words “without hard labour.”

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to insert, after the word “imprisonment,” the words without hard labour.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

COLONEL STANLEY thought they might safely trust to the discretion of the court martial, whether the punishment should or should not be accompanied with hard labour. He was sure they would not inflict the punishment unless necessity called for it.

Question, “That the words ‘without hard labour’ be there inserted,” put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Disobedience to superior officer).

On the Motion of Colonel STANLEY, Amendment in page 4, line 42, after the word “officer,” by inserting the words “in such a manner as to show a wilful defiance of authority.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 19 (Drunkenness).

MAJOR NOLAN moved, as an Amendment, in page 8, line 25, to leave out the words “whether on duty or not,” with the object of separating the punishment for drunkenness off duty from that for drunkenness on duty. As regarded the latter, he proposed to leave the Bill untouched; and with respect to the former, he desired to make the degree of punishment less severe than it was at present. A soldier would, under the Act, be liable to imprisonment for the first time he was found drunk off duty, though, practically, he was only admonished for the first two or three times. It was left quite uncertain when he would be punished, and that uncertainty itself was an evil which should be remedied. He regretted that several hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side, who had promised to support the Amendment, were not, owing to the matter coming on suddenly, in their places.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 25, to leave out the words “whether on duty or not.”—(Major Nolan.)

COLONEL STANLEY thought it would be unadvisable to accept the Amendment. The matter had been carefully looked at; and it had been considered necessary to put the offence of drunkenness in the form—he admitted the somewhat complicated form—in which it appeared in the present Bill; because, as the law at present stood, the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War were not at one on the point. The Commander-in-Chief was, in all these cases, the Court of First Instance, and it was within his discretion to decide whether or not each particular offence of this character was grave enough to be sent for trial. He could not, therefore, accept the Amendment; and he believed that the proposals he had placed on the Paper would, practically, meet the views of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. The amount of difference between them was extremely small; and he trusted, after his explanation, the Amendment would be withdrawn.

Question put,

The House divided : — Ayes 82 ; Noes 25 : Majority 57. — (Div. List, No. 181.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 42 (Offences punishable by ordinary law).

MR. PARNELL moved, as an Amendment, at the end of clause, to add the following Proviso :—

“That, where practicable, every person subject to military law who commits any of the offences mentioned in Schedule of this Bill shall be proceeded against before a civil court of competent jurisdiction, and, on conviction, shall be punished in accordance with the provisions of the Statute or Statutes dealing with such offence.”

Amendment proposed,

At the end of Clause 42, to insert the words “Provided, That, where practicable, every person subject to military law who commits any of the offences mentioned in Schedule of this Bill shall be proceeded against before a civil court of competent jurisdiction, and, on conviction, shall be punished in accordance with the provisions of the statute or statutes dealing with such offence.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

COLONEL STANLEY pointed out that this was already provided for in the last section of the clause—“when in Her Majesty’s Dominions;” and he did not think it was advisable for them to go any further than that.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL moved to insert an Amendment, the object of which, he said, was to render sub-section b more intelligible. Sub-section b provided that a person subject to military law when in Her Majesty’s Dominions might be tried by any competent civil court for any offence for which he would be triable if he were not subject to military law. He proposed, in page 17, line 31, to strike out the word “may” in this sub-section, and to substitute for it the words “shall when practicable.”

Amendment proposed,

In page 17, line 31, to leave out the word “may,” and insert the words “shall when practicable.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘may’ stand part of the Bill.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) opposed the Amendment, because, instead of improving the clause, it would only introduce into it fresh uncertainty and difficulty.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 45 (Scale of punishments by courts martial).

MR. SULLIVAN moved an Amendment, with the view of abolishing distinction of punishment between officers and private soldiers.

Amendment proposed, in page 18, line 20, to leave out the words “in the case of officers.”—(Mr. Sullivan.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill.”

COLONEL STANLEY said, as a general rule, officers and men were on the same footing with regard to civil crimes; but with regard to military offences it was different, and he should oppose the Amendment.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he would not put the House to the trouble of dividing.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

MR. H. SAMUELSON moved an Amendment in page 19, line 24, in order to except Cyprus in time of peace from the possibility of being considered as a “foreign country in our military occupation,” in which the punishments of death or flogging could be inflicted for certain military offences.

Amendment proposed,

In page 19, line 24, to insert, after the word “service,” the words “except in Cyprus in time of peace.”—(Mr. H. Samuelson.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER), in opposing the Amendment, said, that no corporal punishment was inflicted except on active service; and that, therefore, troops serving in Cyprus in time of peace would not be liable to it. He saw no difficulty in construing the paragraph. Active service meant the presence of a soldier—

“With a force engaged in operations in a country or place wholly or partly occupied by an enemy”

—a condition certainly not fulfilled in the case of service in Cyprus. There could be no necessity for the Amendment, as our occupation of Cyprus was not of a hostile character.

SIR HENRY JAMES could not altogether concur with the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. In his opinion, we were in military occupation of the Island. Further than that, the Bill was to be interpreted by soldiers and not by lawyers; and it should, therefore, be most explicit in its terms.

COLONEL STANLEY observed, that the highest legal authorities had held that the words of the Bill were consistent with the interpretation placed on them by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General; and he (Colonel Stanley) fully agreed with his hon. and learned Friend's opinion that the Amendment was unnecessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

MR. H. SAMUELSON moved to add at the end of the clause a Proviso to the effect that no corporal punishment should be inflicted on soldiers whilst in friendly occupation of foreign countries.

Amendment proposed,

In page 19, line 34, to insert, after the word “days,” the words “Provided, That no corporal punishment shall be inflicted on soldiers while in friendly occupation of a foreign country.”—(Mr. H Samuelson.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

COLONEL STANLEY said, he could not accept the Amendment, because the words were not required, as corporal punishment could not be inflicted, except on active service, and soldiers in friendly occupation were not on active service.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY (for Mr. E. JENKINS) moved the addition of the following Proviso—

“That in time of peace within the United Kingdom no officer or soldier shall be kept in arrest and without trial for a longer period than eight days, without the written order of the Commander in Chief expressing the grounds on which the continuation of the arrest and delay of trial are ordered.”

Amendment proposed,

In page 21, line 16, to insert, after the word “custody,” the words “Provided, That in time of peace within the United Kingdom no officer or soldier shall be kept in arrest and without trial for a longer period than eight days, without the written order of the Commander in Chief expressing the grounds on which the continuation of the arrest and delay of trial are ordered.”—(Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

COLONEL STANLEY said, the Amendment was wholly unnecessary, as its substance was contained in Clause 6.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL moved the insertion, at end of Clause 45, after sub-section 8, of words providing that a Volunteer should not be liable under any circumstances to be sentenced by court martial to penal servitude, imprisonment, or corporal punishment. The hon. Member said, that by Clause 164 Volunteers were made subject to the same law on active service as the Regular Forces, and he thought they ought not to be subject to any but the civil law.

Amendment proposed,

In page 20, at the end of Clause 45, to insert the words “A volunteer shall not be liable to be sentenced by a court martial under any circumstances to the punishment of penal servitude, imprisonment with hard labour, or corporal punishment.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

COLONEL STANLEY did not think that these words were necessary, because it would be borne in mind that words had been inserted in the Bill to the effect that a Volunteer when on active service should not come under severer punishment without having fully understood, before he incurred that liability, that he did so incur it. It was not desirable to make distinctions between different branches of the Service as suggested by the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL supported the Amendment, so far as regarded corporal punishment, and hoped the Government would protect a Volunteer soldier from liability to the very degrading punishment of the lash. It was really quite unnecessary, for they had not to deal with desperate, unwilling soldiers in the Volunteers; and, on the other hand, this liability might deter many from giving their aid as Volunteer soldiers.

MR. A. H. BROWN regarded the Amendment as unnecessary.

MR. SULLIVAN moved to amend the Amendment so that the Volunteers could only be exempted from corporal punishment.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "the punishment of penal servitude, imprisonment with hard labour, or."—(Mr. Sullivan.)

MR. PARNELL expressed his willingness to alter his Amendment so as only to exempt Volunteers from being sentenced to corporal punishment.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

MR. MONK supported the Amendment with that limitation.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD also supported the exemption of corporal punishment only.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, he had always heard the Volunteers say that if they were ever called upon to serve in the field they would like to be placed on exactly the same footing as the Regular Army. He was quite sure they would never be subjected to corporal punishment, for he believed they would never put themselves in the position to require its infliction.

MR. H. SAMUELSON strongly demurred to the opinion of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell). He doubted whether men of education in the Volunteer Force would be content to be placed on the same level as what had been called gaol-birds.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was sure that if the Volunteers never committed the offence for which the punishment could be inflicted they would never receive it; but if they did commit such an offence, then they deserved it.

MR. SULLIVAN characterized this as a piece of sophistry. ["Oh!"] The right hon. Gentleman had denied there was any force in it, when others wished to make officers liable to the same punishments as soldiers.

SIR HENRY JAMES supported the Amendment, saying there had been no reason for exempting officers from the liability to corporal punishment which did not apply equally to the case of Volunteers.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT urged that the Amendment was worthy of the favourable consideration of the Government. It had been an argument used by hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House, in support of the lash, that it was a necessity in consequence of the bad class of men that got into the Army; but that with a better class of men it might be done away with. Now, they could not hope to get a better class of men in their Army than the Volunteers; and, therefore, if the Amendment were rejected, the Government would be declaring that, no matter how good a class of men the Army might contain, the lash should not be abolished. He also charged the Government with inconsistency in resisting the Amendment. On the previous evening, they stated there would be no necessity for flogging if the material of our Army was of the same class as that of Germany, while they now proposed to flog the Volunteers, who were soldiers of an élite class.

MR. BIRLEY reminded the hon. and learned Member who had last spoken (Sir William Harcourt) of the inconvenience of having in the field an Army subject to two different systems. There would be some force in the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman if all our Forces were of the same class as the Volunteers; but while an Army was composed of different classes it was necessary they should be all under the same law. It was to be hoped the Government would not accept the Amendment.

MR. RYLANDS said, it was useless to remind the Government of their inconsistency. The fact was that flogging had become the great Conservative Party cry. The Government stuck to flogging, simply because they had nailed their colours to the mast, and were determined to abide by it.

MR. W. E. DENISON was a Volunteer officer of 20 years' standing, and he knew that the feeling of Volunteers was that there should be no distinction between the treatment of Volunteers on active service and ordinary soldiers.

MR. WHITWELL would oppose the clause, as he disapproved altogether of flogging, and more especially for Volunteers.

COLONEL BOUSFIELD considered that the same punishment in the field should apply to all branches of the Service. He held that if a Volunteer, when brigaded with the Regulars, committed an offence to which military law attached flogging, he ought to be flogged, if he deserved it.

Question put,

"That the words 'a volunteer shall not be liable to be sentenced by a court martial under any circumstances to corporal punishment' be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 60; Noes 143: Majority 83.—(Div. List, No. 182.)

MR. PARNELL moved the insertion, at end of Clause 45, of the sub-section—

"A female camp-follower shall not be liable to be sentenced by court martial to corporal punishment."

Amendment agreed to; sub-section inserted accordingly.

MR. PARNELL, in the hope that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would agree to some limitation of the number of times a soldier should be liable to corporal punishment, moved the addition of the following sub-section at the end of Clause 45:—"A soldier shall not be sentenced to corporal punishment more than once in six months."

Amendment proposed,

At the end of Clause 45, to insert the words "A soldier shall not be sentenced to corporal punishment more than once in six months."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. NEWDEGATE opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it appeared to reverse the principle of the ordinary criminal law of the country.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had expressed his opinion on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) only a few days ago, and should, therefore, not occupy the time of the House with any remarks. It was impossible to insure that a man would not commit a crime twice within a period of six months, and, therefore, he could not assent to the proposed Amendment.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

MR. PARNELL said, that there had been evidence presented to the Committee, during the discussion upon the Bill, that no uniformity existed with regard to the cats used throughout the Army and the Navy. His opinion was, therefore, that one pattern should be adopted, and that it should be without knots. It would be remembered that, although it had been stated that there were no knots in the Admiralty cats, it had turned out that most of them had knots. He trusted the Government would show their sense of the evidence which had been adduced with reference to this point, by agreeing to his Motion to add the following sub-section at the end of Clause 45:—

"The instrument to be used in the infliction of corporal punishment shall be a cat-o'-nine-tails according to the sealed pattern approved by the First Lord of the Admiralty, dated the seventh day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, from the Royal Marine Office, and endorsed W. J. Rodney, D.A.G., but without knots."

Amendment proposed,

At the end of Clause 45, to insert the words "The instrument to be used in the infliction of corporal punishment shall be a cat-o'-nine-tails according to the sealed pattern approved by the First Lord of the Admiralty, dated the seventh day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, from the Royal Marine Office, and endorsed W. J. Rodney, D.A.G., but without knots."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed. "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think the Amendment appropriate to the Act; but considered that it would be satisfactory to have some assurance that the character of the punishment should not differ as between the Army and the Navy. As he understood the matter, a certain cat was used in the Navy without knots, and that in the Army, and for the Marines when they were on shore, a knotted cat was in use. He could see no reason why the punishment in the Army should be more severe than it was in the Navy. Why should a Marine when on board ship be punished with one instrument, and when on land with another? There was obviously no reason for this difference, and he thought it would be well that equality of punishment should be assured.

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that he had previously promised that a pattern should be sealed, in order that there might be uniformity with regard to the instruments of punishment. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) that it would not be well to insert these matters in an Act of Parliament. With respect to uniformity of punishment between the two Services, he could not, of course, speak off-hand as to what might be done by the Admiralty, but would confer with his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith) on the question. There was, he thought, a good deal in the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member, although he could not give a positive promise at that moment in the direction indicated.

MR. MACDONALD said, there had been much confusion in the minds of the Members of the Government as to the "cats" used in the Navy. That was strange, seeing that they had two hon. and gallant Admirals at hand to inform them on the subject, one being the fog-horn of the Government—the hon. and gallant Member for Stirlingshire (Sir William Edmonstone)—and the other the amiable figure-head of the Treasury Bench—the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Portsmouth. [Sir JAMES ELPHINSTONE: I am not an Admiral.] Those hon. and gallant Members could, at least, have given a clear explanation upon this point to the First Lord of the Admiralty, who would thereby have been freed from the miserable plight he was put in at the moment. The punishment should be equally gentle for both soldiers and sailors, and the most gentle "cat" he (Mr. Macdonald) knew was the Army cat. He denied, however, that the cat produced was the cat used in the Navy at the present time. He had, himself, when on the Pacific Coast, only about three years ago, been assured by an officer in Her Majesty's Fleet that the cat used on board the ships on the station had nine tails, and nine knots upon each tail, whereas the Admiralty cat produced had no knots. If there were to be knots at all, they should be used equally for the soldier and for the sailor. He trusted that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would press his Amendment to a Division.

MR. CALLAN reminded the House that an assurance had been given, in the course of the preceding discussions, that the cat in use in the Army had no knots in it; but that it had turned out that the cat in use in the Army and the Royal Marines on shore was knotted. The only sealed cat in the Service was the "Marine cat," and the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) wished that cat to be used in the Army, but without knots. He trusted his hon. Friend would persist in dividing the House, until he had ascertained who were in favour of knots and who were against them.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE moved the omission from the proposed Amendment of the words—

"A cat-o'-nine-tails according to the sealed pattern approved by the First Lord of the Admiralty, dated the seventh day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine, from the Royal Marine Office, and endorsed W. J. Rodney, D.A.G., but"

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out all the words after the words "shall be," in line 1, to the word "but," in line 5, inclusive.—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, the Amendment went in the direction which he himself had indicated as desirable, not with the object of diminishing the punishment, but to prevent its being left in the hands of individuals to be made more severe in one case than in another. It was, in his opinion, perfectly sensible and perfectly practicable. He could not see, if corporal punishment was going to be maintained, why the Act should not regulate the character of the instrument by which it would be inflicted. He felt it was right to insist, as the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had insisted, that, during the short time that in his opinion this punishment would endure, it should be regulated both on sea and on land in a manner which would prevent its being varied at the caprice of individuals.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL felt himself bound to vote for the Amendment. He thought the House was entitled to have an assurance from the Government that the instrument of punishment used in the Army would not be more severe than that used in the Navy.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, everybody had admitted that the "Marine cat" was the most severe of all the instruments exhibited to hon. Members of the House. It was not pretended that the Army required a more severe instrument than the Navy, and the instrument for the Navy had been submitted to, and approved by, the First Lord of the Admiralty. What possible reason, therefore, could there be that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War should not tell the House that he was prepared to accept that instrument?

MR. BIGGAR said, that notwithstanding the extent of the humanity claimed by right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, they always seemed to hold out for the extreme amount of torture that could by any possibility be inflicted. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had assured hon. Members, when the Bill was in Committee, that he would make the punishment as moderate as possible; but he (Mr. Biggar) thought it might be assumed that it was intended to make the instrument of torture quite as severe as that used heretofore in the Army. Thanks to the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan), the House had gained an insight into the way affairs of this kind were manipulated, and one result of the hon. Member's inquiry had been that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had been constrained to come forward and apologize for having misled the Committee as to the facts relating to the cats. If some stipulation were not now made, when the Mutiny Bill of next Session was brought forward, another debate would certainly take place upon the subject. He would suggest that the Government should adopt for use in the Army the cat without knots, with the object of making the punishment as moderate as possible.

MR. PARNELL said, he was ready to accept the modification of the Amendment as proposed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke); but, in doing so, wished to point out the mistake which had been made in postponing the consideration of these matters until the Report. The Government, now feeling that they could pass the Bill through the House by a majority, refused the slightest concession; whereas, had this Amendment been proposed in Committee, he (Mr. Parnell) felt sure that it would have been accepted. The question was this. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had stated that the Army cat had no knots. It had since appeared that the Army cat had knots. All that was asked by the Amendment was, that he should adopt the cat without knots, and make the pattern uniform throughout the Army. If this was not agreed to, it would go forth to the country that the Secretary of State for War insisted upon retaining, as the instrument of torture, a cat that had knots, and which might be of any pattern that the commanding officer might think proper.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Main Question, as amended, proposed,

"That the instrument to be used in the infliction of corporal punishment shall be without knots."

MR. SULLIVAN reminded the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) that he had warned him not to give way to the blandishments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and yield the advantage they had in Committee. However, they could renew the struggle next spring, when the Continuance Bill came up. He had no doubt that the Government were influenced to maintain the lash by a feeling of pride; but could not help thinking that they would next year generously abandon it. It seemed to him better that the Amendment should be withdrawn entirely, and that a statutory definition of the instrument should be given in the Schedule. It was surely anomalous to deal with the subject of punishment without attempting to define the instrument by which it was to be inflicted. He suggested that the lashes should not exceed 12 inches in length, and that the handle should not exceed eight inches in length and four ounces in weight.

Question put.

MR. PARNELL moved as an Amendment that, at the end of Clause 45, the following sub-section be inserted—

(Manner of infliction.)

"Sentences of corporal punishment shall be inflicted in manner directed by rules, to be issued by a Secretary of State, and care shall be taken that the infliction of such punishment shall not be continued after the skin is broken, or blood drawn, and that no flogging in front is permitted, and that if the infliction of a sentence of corporal punishment is stopped for any cause, before completion, it shall not be afterwards completed."

During the course of these debates, it had been stated by the noble and gallant Lord the Member for the County of Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford) that he had never seen the skin broken in flogging, although he had seen many instances of flogging. There was also the testimony of other hon. and gallant Officers who stated that they had not only frequently seen the skin broken, but blood drawn, and particles of flesh flying about. If the Government desired to follow the noble and gallant Lord the Member for the County of Waterford, who was a Naval officer of considerable distinction, in his testimony as to how flogging was to be restricted, he would ask them to accept the Amendment which he (Mr. Parnell) now proposed, and to provide that if the infliction of a sentence of corporal punishment was stopped for any cause whatever before its completion it should not afterwards be completed. Sentences had been frequently stopped, because a man had not been able to bear the punishment, and it was not right that he should be afterwards brought out to suffer the rest of his penalty. Such a proceeding was calculated to inflict grievous torture which no man should be called upon to endure. With regard to flogging in front, he did not apprehend that it would be permitted under ordinary circumstances; but he knew that it had taken place under somewhat extraordinary circumstances. It had taken place where martial law had been proclaimed, and he would not be surprised if Zulus who happened to be caught were flogged in that way. He thought it was exceedingly desirable that they should provide in that Act of Parliament that flogging was to be used as little as possible as a torture, and, therefore, he begged to move the sub-section which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of Clause 45, to insert the words "Sentences of corporal punishment shall be inflicted in manner directed by rules to be issued by a Secretary of State, and care shall be taken that the infliction of such punishment shall not be continued after the skin is broken or blood drawn, and that no flogging in front is permitted, and that if the infliction of a sentence of corporal punishment is stopped for any cause before completion, it shall not be afterwards completed." —(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY wished the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to understand that it did not at all follow that because the Government objected to the insertion of this sub-section in the Bill they would sanction the practice against which the Amendment was directed. Undoubtedly, they would not; but the objection to the insertion of the sub-section in the Bill was owing to reasons which he had already explained. He would repeat that he could not accept the Amendment, because it would be impossible to describe all the circumstances under which punishment could be inflicted; and it would be impossible to provide that no punishment should be continued after the skin had been broken or the blood drawn. He was bound to say that, so far as his experience went, he had never seen blood drawn. With regard to flogging in front, he would ask the hon. Member to state any case, within the last 50 years, in which that had been permitted; for his own part, he had never heard of the practice. He would not go as far as to say that it had not occurred; but he would only say that he had never heard of it except from the hon. Member. With regard to the part of the Amendment relating to the completion of sentences of corporal punishment which had once been stopped, he knew of no case, nor did he think it possible that a case could occur, why a man should be taken to a hospital and then brought out to receive the remainder of his sentence. Such a thing would be contrary to the custom of the Service, and he believed it would be positively illegal.

MR. H. SAMUELSON observed, that it appeared to him that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War objected to that part of the Amendment which stated that blood was not to be drawn. He thought that if they were to have their flesh it would be as well to have their blood also. Perhaps the objection might be met by leaving out all the words after the word "State," thus providing that sentences of corporal punishment were to be inflicted in the manner directed by rules to be issued by a Secretary of State. He begged to move that all the words be omitted after the word "State" in the Amendment.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK seconded the Amendment. He conceived that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would do well to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) as amended in the manner proposed. He could not see any reason at all why, if this punishment were to be retained, it should not be regulated by all the means in their power. There did not seem to him to be any shadow of reason why it should not be provided that the punishment was only to be inflicted in accordance with rules laid down by the Secretary of State. It was a reasonable and a practical suggestion, and on those grounds he recommended it to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. The adoption of the proposal would not limit the punishment; it could only prevent it from being abused. He could see no reason why the right hon. and gallant Gentleman should not assent to so reasonable a proposition. It had been decided to retain corporal punishment for reasons with which he did not agree; but, that being so, he thought that it should be recognized that the manner of its infliction should be regulated as well as the punishment itself being authorized. There would be no difficulty at all for the Secretary of State for War to draw up rules regulating in detail the application of the punishment in the same manner as he was going to draw up rules regulating the procedure of Courts of Inquiry. They desired that while this punishment was retained as a matter of necessity, although for reasons with which many of them did not agree, that, at all events, the evil attendant on the punishment should be prevented, and they should preclude the punishment from being used capriciously.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out all the words after the word "State," in line 2, to the end of the Question.—(Mr. H. Samuelson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

Mr. H. Samuelson

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT thought it would expedite Business if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War agreed to the clause of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), in the manner in which it was now proposed to be amended.

MR. MILBANK wished to ask a question of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, with reference to flogging with the left hand as well as with the right. Sentences of corporal punishment were, according to the Amendment, to be inflicted in the manner directed by rules drawn up by a Secretary of State. The practice now was that men were flogged beginning with the right hand, and when a man had received a certain number of cuts from the lash from a right-handed man, a left-handed man—usually a drummer in the Infantry, and a farrier in the Cavalry—was put on to give him the remaining quantity of lashes. The consequence of that practice was, what was known in the Army as "cross-cuts." He had observed that the noble and gallant Lord the Member for the County of Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford), in the Division which had just taken place had voted with the minority. He would like to know from him whether he was speaking correctly in what he said? His opinion was that when a man had received some 20 lashes from a cat with knots the skin was broken. It was another question whether blood flowed, for that would probably happen after three or four cuts; but he maintained that after the skin was broken a man ought to be cut down from the triangles, and let off the remainder of the punishment. If the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Waterford was in his place, perhaps he would inform the House whether he was in favour of corporal punishment being inflicted under rules directed by the Secretary of State. For his part, he (Mr. Milbank) could assure the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that he had seen the skin broken many times, and he knew many officers now serving in the Army who had also seen it.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that his right hon. and gallant Friend would have no objection to adopting the Amendment, if all the words after "Secretary of State" were struck out.

MR. PARNELL said, that he would be very happy to agree to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson). He merely wished to suggest to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that these rules should be laid before the House.

MR. MACDONALD said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was perfectly right in saying that flogging in front had been abandoned. He believed it had been abandoned for something like 40 years; but it did exist for a long time. He thought that the mode of flogging required regulation, for there were several practices—there was flogging half-length and flogging three-quarter-length, the latter of which was of a very much more severe character than the former. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was about to issue instructions upon the subject of flogging, he hoped he would insert, amongst the directions, that the officer who was present at every act of punishment should direct that flogging should only be half-length. In that case, the injury would not be so severe, and the danger to the sufferer was not so great as that incurred by three-quarter-length; and, above all, he should instruct that there should be right-handed and left-handed flogging.

MR. BIGGAR was sorry that his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had agreed to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson), for it was his conviction that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were disposed to inflict very cruel punishments. For his part, he expected that the rules that would be framed by the three right hon. Gentlemen who had charge of the different Departments of the Prisons, the Army, and the Navy, with reference to flogging, would permit all the cruelties that could be inflicted. He fully expected that the joint labours of those three right hon. Gentlemen would end in the infliction of every cruelty that was possible.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD thought there had been some misunderstanding with regard to this matter. He had been asked why he voted against the Government just now? He did so, because he understood that the question was whether the cat to be used for flogging was to have knots. He really thought there must be some mistake with regard to this matter, for he did not believe that any hon. Gentlemen on those Benches would vote for a cat with knots. If there was any doubt upon the matter, it would be far better to put in a clause to the effect that there should be no knots in the cat.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. PARNELL moved, to add, at end of Clause 45, the following sub-section:—

(Annual returns of sentences of flogging.)

“Returns shall be annually laid before Parliament of all sentences of flogging which have been inflicted in whole or in part, specifying the number of lashes and the nature of the offence.”

Amendment agreed to; sub-section inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in Clause 46, page 20, line 20, to leave out all the words from the beginning of the line to the end of line 27.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 47 (Power of commanding officer).

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 21, line 36, after sub-section (c), to insert, as a further paragraph—

“Where the charge is against a soldier for drunkenness not on duty, the commanding officer shall deal with the case summarily, unless the soldier was guilty of drunkenness after being warned for duty, or unless he has been guilty of drunkenness on not less than four occasions in the preceding twelve months.”

Amendment agreed to; paragraph inserted accordingly.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 21, line 38, before the words “is in temporary command,” to insert—

“Is in command of a detachment of troops consisting of, or equivalent in strength to, not less than four troops, or companies, or”

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, in page 22, line 2, after “twenty-one days,” to insert as a new paragraph—

"Provided, That where imprisonment is awarded for absence without leave, the commanding officer shall have regard to the number of days during which the offender has been absent, and in no case shall the term of imprisonment awarded exceed the term of absence by more than four clear days."

MAJOR NOLAN said, that it had now been provided that a commanding officer was only to inflict such a term of imprisonment for absence without leave as should correspond with the period during which the man had been absent. The commanding officer was thus only a registry clerk, and there was no case in which necessity for this paragraph would arise. He apprehended that this Amendment was not required.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he was disposed to agree with the view taken of the Amendment by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), and he did not think there would be any good in retaining the words.

Amendment agreed to; paragraph inserted accordingly.

On the Motion of Major NOLAN, Amendment made, in page 22, line 2, after "days," by inserting—

"Provided that the number of days' imprisonment does not exceed the number of days' absence."

MR. C. S. PARKER said, his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bath (Sir Arthur Hayter) was absent; but he (Mr. C. S. Parker) would move the Amendment standing in his name—namely, to insert the word "district" before the word "court martial" in page 22, line 16.

Amendment agreed to; word inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 49 (General and district courts martial).

MAJOR NOLAN moved, as an Amendment, in page 23, line 33, to leave out the word "seven," and insert the words "not less than five." His object was to insure that a court martial should always consist of five officers. In the cases where they provided that three officers should be sufficient, they were the very cases in which courts martial ought to be most stringently looked after. They ought, in his opinion, never to have less than five.

Amendment proposed, in page 23, line 32, to leave out the word "seven," and insert the words "not less than five."—(Major Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'seven' stand part of the Bill."

COLONEL STANLEY replied, that this question was much discussed in Committee, and, while he agreed with the views of the hon. and gallant Member (Major Nolan) to some extent, experience had shown that, in certain circumstances of the Service, and especially in certain Colonies, it was practically impossible to obtain more than three officers. Considerable inconvenience would result from the limitation to five. On the West Coast of Africa, for instance, and other Colonies where there were not many officers serving, five would be very rarely obtainable, and the result would be to keep the prisoner detained for an unnecessary time. The balance of many years' experience had shown that the numbers proposed in the clause were the best; and he, therefore, thought it was better to adhere to what had been proved by practice.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would retain the number mentioned in line 32, because he proposed to alter the clause himself, lower down, so as to give three alternative courses, and to have seven at home, five where they were obtainable, and where five were not obtainable, then three. He believed that would meet the exigencies of the Service and the wishes of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Nolan) at the same time. He therefore proposed, in line 35, to move the insertion of certain words.

MR. SPEAKER said, the Amendment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War should be put first.

MAJOR NOLAN withdrew his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 23, line 32, to leave out all the words from "consist of," in order to insert these words—

"Not less than seven officers: Provided, That if in any place not in the United Kingdom, India, Malta, or Gibraltar, in the opinion of the officer who convenes the court (such opinion to be expressed in the order convening the court, and to be conclusive), seven officers are not, having due regard to the public service, available, the court shall consist of five officers, unless, in the opinion of the said officer (such opinion to be expressed in the order convening the court, and to be conclusive) five officers are not, having due regard to the public service, available, in which case the court martial may consist of three officers."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked, whether the acceptance of the Amendment excluded the one he had stated it was his intention to propose?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

Clause 52 (Challenges by prisoner).

Amendments made.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 26, line 18, to leave out "two-thirds are required to concur," and insert "one third are expressed to be sufficient."

MAJOR NOLAN asked, what was the meaning of the phrase that one-third should be expressed to be sufficient?

COLONEL STANLEY explained, that these Amendments had to do with objections raised by a prisoner. They all hung together.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK complained that it was impossible to understand Amendments moved in this way without explanation. He was sure neither he, nor his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had the least idea what the effect of the clause would be when these Amendments were inserted.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought the alteration made was quite intelligible, and fell in quite easily with the previous changes. He thought, however, there must be some mistake in inserting the word "one-third."

MR. C. S. PARKER also was of opinion that it was not business-like to insert Amendments which they did not understand. There must be some mistake, as his hon. Friend had pointed out. In many places in the Bill, a majority of two-thirds was received; but there was no place where the vote of one-third carried the decision.

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 55 (Confirmation, revision, and approval of sentences).

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 30, line 2, after "authority," to insert—

"And where a court martial is held in a Colony, and there is no such superior officer in that Colony, the Governor of that Colony shall have authority to confirm the finding and sentence of such court martial in like manner in all respects as if he were such superior officer as above mentioned."

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had never heard of the principle contained in the Amendment, of allowing the Governor of a Colony to confirm the finding of courts martial. It would be extremely dangerous as a precedent when martial law was proclaimed; and it was, in his opinion, unfair to bring up such a clause on Report, the principle of which was totally unprecedented.

COLONEL STANLEY explained, that the Amendment was intended to apply to very rare cases, which might happen, for instance, in such places as the West Coast of Africa, where, the decision of the court martial having to be sent home for confirmation, a man might be kept, in consequence, a considerable time in prison. The object of the Amendment was, therefore, to save the detention of the prisoner.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 63 (Execution of sentences of imprisonment).

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, to leave out the word "civil," in page 34, line 38.

Amendment agreed to; word struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 72 (Clause B. Provost marshal).

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT, in moving as an Amendment, in page 40, line 35, after "authority," to insert—

"On any soldier, but in the case of persons who are employed by or are in the service of any of Her Majesty's troops when employed on active service beyond the seas, it shall be lawful for such provost marshal to award and inflict punishment for minor offences, for dealing with which he may not consider it convenient to convene a court martial, subject always to regulations issued for his guidance by the general or other officer commanding;"

said, the Bill as it then stood contained a great anomaly, which the Amendment he was about to move was intended to remedy—namely, that all camp-followers, and those who were described in the Amendment as persons in the employ and Service of Her Majesty's troops when employed on active service beyond the seas, must be tried by court martial for any sort of offence which they might commit. He was aware that provision was made in the Indian Military Code to meet this case. But this would certainly not meet the case of, for instance, the persons employed in South Africa as carriers by Sir Garnet Wolseley, all of whom would have to be tried by court martial for any offence they might commit. It was necessary that some organization should be provided by which minor offences might be checked; and he, therefore, moved the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 40, line 35, after the word "authority," to insert the words, "On any soldier, but in the case of persons who are employed by or are in the service of any of Her Majesty's troops when employed on active service beyond the seas, it shall be lawful for such provost marshal to award and inflict punishment for minor offences for dealing with which it may not be considered expedient to convene a court martial, subject always to regulations issued for his guidance by the general or other officer commanding."—(Colonel Arbuthnot.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK opposed the Amendment, on the ground that the practical difficulty could be got over by convening a small standing court martial to deal with camp-followers.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 75 (Change of conditions of service).

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, the addition of the following words at the end of the clause—

"Or for any period of time not exceeding twelve years in the whole from the day on which he enlisted."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 77 (Mode of enlistment and attestation).

MAJOR NOLAN said, it would be useful to insert a provision against the enlistment of men when under the influence of liquor, and he proposed to add words which would decide a doubtful magistrate to stop the enlistment of recruits in that condition. It had been objected that an Amendment which was proposed in Committee with this object would be looked upon as an insult to the magistrates; but the words that he desired to introduce could be acted upon by the magistrates without any loss of dignity; and he therefore moved, in page 42, line 34, to insert the words—

"And shall not proceed with the enlistment, if he considers the recruit under the influence of liquor."

MR. O'SULLIVAN hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would see his way to accept the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway.

MR. H. SAMUELSON pointed out that many recruits at the time of their enlistment were, although not very drunk, just able to understand what was said to them when they were prompted.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 78 (Power of recruit to purchase discharge).

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME said, he was sorry that the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) was not in his place to bring the weight of his experience to bear upon the points which he (Captain Milne-Home) wished to urge in connection with the Amendments to the clause standing in the names of the hon. and gallant Men-

ber and himself. It was not his intention to take the extreme course of moving the rejection of the clause, which had been already discussed and disposed of in Committee; but he could not help feeling that its retention, at all events, in the form in which it then stood, would be detrimental to the Service, and a source of unfairness to many soldiers serving in the Army. He objected to the clause altogether, because it treated of a matter which he considered to be one of Departmental detail that ought to be dealt with by the military authorities. Without wishing to detain the House, he would only place the Amendments before the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, in the hope that he would turn round in his place to say that he agreed to them. He was, however, obliged to remind the House that the clause presented an entirely new principle, and he thought the House should be informed by whom that principle had been recommended; because, if he mistook not, no such recommendation was made by the Committee upstairs. The 21st Article of War provided that a soldier should not be dismissed from the Service without a discharge granted according to General Order, and the Warrant then in force stated that no soldier could demand his discharge as a matter of right. The present clause, however, allowed a soldier of under three months' service to claim his discharge upon the payment of £10. His (Captain Milne-Home's) first Amendment was to leave out the word "three," and insert the word "one," in line 32, page 43, of the Bill. He objected to the period of three months named in the clause upon the score of the expense to the country which it entailed. This was particularly apparent in the case of Cavalry regiments, in which the training of a recruit during a period of three months cost from £20 to £30. If, therefore, the soldier was discharged at the end of three months, the country would thereby be at a loss of £10 to £20; because, on his discharge, he had only to pay the sum of £10 for the use of Her Majesty. The man would leave the Service a much better article, so to speak—well conducted, set up, drilled, and, in short, a very much more marketable commodity in the labour market than he was before he joined it. It must also be recollected that if a man, after three months' service, was discharged, another man would have to be brought in to fill his place who had no service at all. With regard to his second Amendment, he thought that if the clause was to stand in its present form, the commanding officer ought to have something to say with reference to a recruit's leaving at the end of three months, because great inconvenience might result from this, especially if a large number of men claimed their discharge at one time. Under those circumstances, more work would be thrown on their comrades who remained in the regiment; and he, therefore, thought that the men ought not to be allowed to claim their discharge except with the approval of the commanding officer. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving the first of the Amendments of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed, in page 43, line 32, to leave out the word "three," and insert the word "one."—(Captain Milne-Home.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Bill."

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the House would not accept the Amendment. The subject had been discussed at considerable length in Committee, and the present regulations had met with the general approval of the House. His own convictions in the matter were strengthened by the recommendations of a Departmental Committee consisting of very experienced officers.

Clause 83 (Prolongation of service in certain cases).

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 47, line 6, to leave out the word "active."

Amendment agreed to; word struck out accordingly.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 47, line 12, at the end, to insert, as a separate paragraph—

"If a soldier required under this section to be discharged or sent to the United Kingdom desires, while a state of war exists between Her Majesty and any foreign power, to continue in

Her Majesty's service, and the competent military authority approve, he may agree to continue as a soldier of the regular forces in the same manner in all respects as if his term of service were still unexpired, except that he may claim his discharge at the end of such state of war, or, if it is so provided by such agreement, at the expiration of any period of three months after he has given notice to his commanding officer of his wish to be discharged."

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 47, line 26, after the word "enlistment," to insert—

Clause 86 (Discharge or transfer to reserve).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 48, line 4, after "Act," to insert "or the Acts relating to the reserved forces." The hon. Gentleman said, in explanation, that that and the following Amendment were for the purpose of enabling a soldier to be continued in the Reserve after having served his time in the Army. Under other Acts, a soldier could be kept in the Reserves when his period of Army service had expired, and the object of the Amendment was to make it clear that he could do so with his consent.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 48, line 6, to add at the end "or, with his assent, transferred to the reserve forces."

Colonel Stanley

Amendment proposed,

"In page 48, line 6, after the word "discharged," to insert the words "or with his assent transferred to the reserve forces."—(Sir George Campbell.)

COLONEL STANLEY thought that those words were useless. Under the Reserved Forces Act, anyone who pleased and was eligible might go into the Reserves. There was no power to transfer a man without his consent.

Clause 90 (Justices of the peace for the purposes of enlistment).

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, that as the hon. and gallant Member for Winchester (Colonel Naghten) was not in his place, he (Mr. Samuelson) would move the Amendment which stood in his name. Militia officers were always subject to military law, and it would be quite impossible for them to act as justices of the peace as the clause stood. To remedy that he would move in page 50, line 42, after the word "Act," to insert "except officers of Militia while the regiments to which they belong are disembodied."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 91 (Enlistment of foreigners and negroes).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 51, line 7, to leave out the words "so enlisted." The object of the Amendment was to make it quite clear how far aliens were eligible for the position of commissioned officers in Her Majesty's Service. The clause under notice provided for the enlistment of aliens as soldiers in Her Majesty's Army, and proceeded to enact that aliens so enlisted should not be competent to hold higher rank than that of warrant officer or non-commissioned officer. It seemed hard that after having served a certain period as soldiers, aliens should be incapable of being made officers, unless it were also clear that they were incapable of being made officers if they had not entered the ranks at all. He proposed to omit the words "so enlisted," in order to make it quite clear that no alien should be capable of holding higher rank in Her Majesty's Service than that of warrant or non-commissioned officer. It would, of course, be open to an alien to be naturalized and then to hold a commission, whether he had served in the ranks or not.

Amendment proposed, in page 51, line 7, to leave out the words "so enlisted."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'so enlisted' stand part of the Bill."

MAJOR NOLAN deprecated so strict a line as that proposed being drawn. The suggestion came at an important time; because, if the late Prince Imperial had had a more defined position, he would probably not have been allowed to have entered on the expedition which resulted in his death.

Question put, and agreed to.

Another Amendment made.

Clause 101 (Liability to provide billets).

MR. O'SULLIVAN moved, as an Amendment, in page 54, line 35, after the word "alehouses," to insert "bakers, butchers, and refreshment house keepers." He hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would have no objection to the insertion of this Amendment. Under the present system of limiting billeting to alehouses and inns, there was often a great want of accommodation. He did not see why the butchers and bakers, and refreshment house keepers, should not be under the same liability to accommodate the troops as the inn-keepers. Many times he had seen great inconvenience result from the accommodation being limited, as it now was, to public-houses. He trusted it would be extended according to the terms of his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 54, line 35, to insert, after the word "alehouses," the words "bakers, butchers, and refreshment house keepers."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CALLAN hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would not yield to the proposal of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan). The butchers and bakers only kept houses for their own accommodation; whereas, by the Acts under which public-houses were licensed in Ireland, they were compelled to provide accommodation for the public. He trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not inflict private soldiers upon the butchers and bakers, but would limit the accommodation, as at present, to licensed houses.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the question of billeting was of some importance. The Bill placed the Irish law of billeting upon the same footing as the English. Formerly, billeting in private houses took place in Ireland. It was not necessary for him to say more than that he could not accept the Amendment. He should be prepared, however, to make arrangements to prevent inconvenience to the troops, if it were brought to the notice of the authorities.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE considered that the convenience of troops on the march was a matter of great importance. At present, much inconvenience was suffered from the troops having to be billeted exclusively in taverns. If the butchers and bakers had the best houses in a town, then he thought that the troops ought to be billeted in them. He hoped the Amendment would be accepted.

MR. ONSLOW pointed out that, by the provisions of the Bill, all persons selling wine, brandy, spirits, strong waters, cider, or metheglin by retail were compellable to give accommodation to the troops. He thought it would be going too far to make the butchers and bakers also take the troops in.

MAJOR NOLAN understood that a new Schedule was to be framed fixing the prices for billeting. It would be absurd to make the butchers and bakers liable to have troops billeted upon them, for their houses were as much private houses as the linendrapers.

Clause 103 (Accommodation and pay- on billet).

MAJOR O'BEIRNE moved, as an page 56, line 13, after s," to insert "and the missioned officer authoraised to demand such billets." The effect of the Amendment was to give an officer or non-commissioned officer a right to reject a billet he did not consider suitable. There were opportunities at present for some innkeepers to escape receiving troops by agreement with the constable, the excuse being given that all the beds in their hotels were engaged. In consequence of that, troops had frequently to be billeted two or three miles away from their place of parade. That had happened at Leicester, Reigate, and other places; and he had known it done, although the innkeepers had plenty of accommodation.

Amendment proposed,

In page 56, line 13, after the word "billets," to insert the words "and the officer or non-commissioned officer authorized to demand such billets."—(Major O'Beirne)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY did not think it would be wise to insert these words in the Bill, as they would introduce an entirely new principle. Hitherto, billets had had to be demanded from the civil authorities entitled to issue them, and the matter was entirely in their hands. Moreover, he should not like to leave so large a discretionary power in the hands of the non-commissioned officers. It would be far better to leave the discretion in the hands of the civil officials.

Clause 126 (Arrangements with Indian and colonial governments as to prisons).

MR. PARNELL said, he had to move an Amendment in page 69, to add, at the end thereof—

"And in all cases where the court has so otherwise ordered, returns shall be annually laid before Parliament specifying such sentences, and stating the special reasons for such order in each case."

This Amendment was one which he thought the Government would agree to. It referred to the limitation placed upon sentences of over twelve months' imprisonment inflicted abroad. It had been provided that unless the court otherwise directed the punishment should take place in England. He only wished for

Major O'Beirne

Returns to be laid before Parliament giving the special reasons why courts martial had decided that the imprisonment should take place abroad.

Amendment proposed,

In line 69, to insert, at the end of Clause, the words "and in all cases where the court has so otherwise ordered, Returns shall be annually laid before Parliament specifying such sentences, and stating the special reasons for such order in each case."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had no objection to the proposal in principle. He did not think, however, that it would be desirable to have Returns of all the cases laid before Parliament. If any particular case were required, then a Return in respect of it could be moved for. It would cause a great deal of useless labour and expense to have Returns made in all cases.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 127 (Duty of governor of prison to receive prisoners, deserters, and absentees without leave).

Amendment proposed,

In page 69, to insert, at the end of Clause, the words "and Returns shall be annually laid before Parliament of all proceedings and evidence taken at inquests or other inquiries into the deaths of prisoners."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS observed, that the evidence and proceedings at inquests on prisoners would be too bulky to be conveniently laid before the House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT did not see why the evidence in these cases should be laid before Parliament more than in other cases. No Returns were required in ordinary cases, and he could see no reason for their being required here. If the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) wished that Parliament should have cognizance of these matters, of course, everyone knew that they

Friend (Mr. Parnell), with reference to this Motion, and would ask him not to press it.

MR. PARNELL felt the force of what had been said, and did not think they could do much good in pressing this question any further. The House was really not in a position to discuss the question as it ought to be discussed; while, if they had a Morning Sitting, the House would feel rather injured at being called upon to discuss once more the question of flogging. He would have an opportunity of bringing this forward on the Army Estimates, and he thought he might fairly postpone it till then. He, therefore, should not propose to move any Amendment in Clause 128. He should, indeed, take no further part in this matter, but would renew his opposition to the prison cat on the Irish Estimates before the close of the Session, and deal with it more effectually in that way.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 164 (Persons subject to military law as soldiers).

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT, in moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice, hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would not object to it. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman could hardly contemplate leaving the Bill in its present state, and he really thought he might consent to this Amendment without injuring his position.

Amendment proposed,

In page 94, line 15, to insert, after the word "law," the words "and such persons shall, for purposes of military control and discipline, be subject to such regulations as may be issued from time to time by the general or other officer commanding, though not specified in this Act."—(Colonel Arbuthnot.)

Clause 177 (Interpretation of terms).

MR. H. SAMUELSON moved, as an Amendment, in page 106, line 21, after "military," to insert "and hostile." He wished to impress upon the Government that something certainly must be done to meet the case of Cyprus. It was certainly not a hostile occupation. It was an occupation, there was no doubt, and it was a place of arms. They were also bound to give it up in case they did certain things which it was not at all likely they would do. At the same time, it was clear that Cyprus was not a Colony, nor part of the Dominions of Her Majesty the Queen. Therefore, something ought to be done to bring Cyprus under the administration of the law.

Amendment proposed,

In page 106, line 21, to insert, after the word "military," the words "and hostile."—(Mr. H. Samuelson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT supported the Amendment, observing that Cyprus was not a colony, and was not dealt with as such. If they would look at line 38, page 106, it would be seen that a foreign country meant any place not situate in the United Kingdom, the Colonies, or India. By putting in the words "or Cyprus," the clause would be made perfect.

MR. COURTNEY said, by that proposition, no doubt, the case of Cyprus would be met. At present, the clause did not deal with cases where they might be in possession of a country, or part of a country, in which they were not carrying on active operations. They might, for instance, be in occupation of part of Belgium, Portugal, or Denmark, and these cases would not be dealt with at all under the present Bill. He thought the insertion of the words would meet the case very fairly.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, he had no objection to the words suggested; but it seemed to him that the phrase "military occupation" was perfectly well understood. It was an occupation by the military forces as distinct from the civil government, and where there was an occupation by the military forces they ought to have extraordinary powers.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was not a question whether it was a hostile occupation. For instance, supposing they were in occupation of Eastern Roumelia, in time of peace, would they allow a death-penalty to be enforced under such circumstances?

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 92: Majority 82.—(Div. List, No. 185.)

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, he had already explained that he would not move any of his Amendments, if the Government would accept one of them; and if he knew the Government were about to accept this one, he certainly would not have put the Committee to the trouble of division.

Other Amendments made.

Question, "That the Bill, as amended, be reported to the House," put, and agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped he might appeal to the House, for reasons of Public Business, to read the Bill a third time at once.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Colonel Stanley.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT would take that opportunity of hoping that his right hon. and gallant Friend would further consider an Amendment which they were not able to discuss fully—the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson). He (Sir William Harcourt) hoped in "another place" the difference between a military and a hostile occupation would be fully considered. He thought, if his right hon. and gallant Friend would carefully consider the matter, he would come to the same conclusion.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT hoped, if time would allow, that the matter to which he had already called attention twice would also be borne in mind on another occasion.

Question put, and agreed to.

• Bill read the third time, and passed.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE ZULU WAR— LATEST TELEGRAMS.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL asked if the Government had received any fresh intelligence from South Africa?

VISCOUNT BURY, in reply, said, the following telegrams from Major General Hon. H. Clifford to the Secretary of State for the Colonies were received yesterday from St. Vincent:—

“PIETERMARITZBURG, July 3.

“General left here July 1, 7 a.m., for Durnford et Durban, at which place Chelmsford's despatch in answer to Wolseley's orders reached him. General arrived Port Durnford, July 2, but not yet able to land, surf too high. Euphrates, with drafts, arrived Durban to-day; was to have disembarked everything at Port Durnford, but Commodore cannot anchor. No direct news from Chelmsford since 29th June; information given had been anticipated by officers who arrived from his camp and gave news. Newdigate advancing on Ulundi; force of 500 whites, with surplus waggons, in laager, left about 10 miles from Ulundi; expected to be at Ulundi 1st July. Crealock still at Napoleon Hill; ground in front difficult; no roads; transport required; have sent up four sections mule transport, 48 wagons; native carrier corps being formed for transport of Crealock's Division 2,000 strong at first, if found to answer will be increased to 5,000.

“JULY 4, 8 a.m.

“Have not heard that Wolseley has landed at Port Durnford. Chelmsford's message to Wolseley of June 30 says, ‘Five miles from Entanguin, 10 from Umvolosi River; King's messengers have just left with message from me that I must advance to position left bank of river; I do so to-morrow, but will stop hostilities pending negotiations if demands communicated are complied with by July 3; these demands are, that Indunas come with cattle and guns. I have consented to receive 1,000 captured rifles instead of regiment laying down its arms. As my supply will only permit of my remaining here until July 10, it is desirable I should inform you of conditions of peace to be demanded. White man with King states he has 20,000 men; King anxious to fight; Princes not. Where is Crealock's column? If Wolseley lands before 12 this day, which is last moment for telegraphing you by Olympus, you will be informed. English horses have arrived safe at Cape. Wolseley not able land Port Durnford; returns in Shah to Durban to-day; proceeds by land to 1st Division immediately.

“Noon.

“No further news from Chelmsford has reached me; Wolseley not yet arrived at Durban from Port Durnford.

“2.35 p.m.

“No further news has reached me from Chelmsford, or of Wolseley having landed at Durban.”

SLAVERY IN CUBA.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD SELBORNE, who had given Notice to call attention to the question of slavery in Cuba, and to move for—

“Copies of all despatches and papers containing any communications on that subject which have passed between Her Majesty's Government or Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid and the Spanish Government, and which have not already been laid before Parliament;”

said: It may be in the recollection of those of your Lordships who take an interest in the subject of Slavery, that, on the 21st of March last, my noble Friend (Earl Granville) asked the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government were taking any steps with a view to obtain the fulfilment of the assurances which had been given by the Government of Spain as to the total abolition of Slavery in the Spanish Possessions? My noble Friend put no undue pressure upon the Government: he would have been content if he had only learned that something was really being done. But the noble Marquess, after referring to the change which had then lately taken place in the Spanish Ministry, said that it must be remembered that the matter was one entirely of internal regulation, and that, but for the promise which the Spanish Government had volunteered, we should have no right to mention the subject. That answer occasioned both disappointment and surprise — disappointment, because it was very different in its tone from a letter received less than a year before from the Foreign Office by the Anti-Slavery Society, in reply to a Memorial which it had presented; surprise, because it was impossible to reconcile it either with the tenour of the language held by the Predecessors of the present Secretary of State, or with the real facts on which the right of this country to remonstrate with Spain rested. I can only suppose that the noble Marquess had been too

Clause 72 (Clause B. Provost marshal).

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT, in moving as an Amendment, in page 40, line 35, after "authority," to insert—

"On any soldier, but in the case of persons who are employed by or are in the service of any of Her Majesty's troops when employed on active service beyond the seas, it shall be lawful for such provost marshal to award and inflict punishment for minor offences, for dealing with which he may not consider it convenient to convene a court martial, subject always to regulations issued for his guidance by the general or other officer commanding;"

said, the Bill as it then stood contained a great anomaly, which the Amendment he was about to move was intended to remedy—namely, that all camp-followers, and those who were described in the Amendment as persons in the employ and Service of Her Majesty's troops when employed on active service beyond the seas, must be tried by court martial for any sort of offence which they might commit. He was aware that provision was made in the Indian Military Code to meet this case. But this would certainly not meet the case of, for instance, the persons employed in South Africa as carriers by Sir Garnet Wolseley, all of whom would have to be tried by court martial for any offence they might commit. It was necessary that some organization should be provided by which minor offences might be checked; and he, therefore, moved the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 40, line 35, after the word "authority," to insert the words, "On any soldier, but in the case of persons who are employed by or are in the service of any of Her Majesty's troops when employed on active service beyond the seas, it shall be lawful for such provost marshal to award and inflict punishment for minor offences for dealing with which it may not be considered expedient to convene a court martial, subject always to regulations issued for his guidance by the general or other officer commanding."—(Colonel Arbuthnot.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK opposed the Amendment, on the ground that the practical difficulty could be got over by convening a small standing court martial to deal with camp-followers.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 75 (Change of conditions of service).

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, the addition of the following words at the end of the clause—

"Or for any period of time not exceeding twelve years in the whole from the day on which he enlisted."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 77 (Mode of enlistment and attestation).

MAJOR NOLAN said, it would be useful to insert a provision against the enlistment of men when under the influence of liquor, and he proposed to add words which would decide a doubtful magistrate to stop the enlistment of recruits in that condition. It had been objected that an Amendment which was proposed in Committee with this object would be looked upon as an insult to the magistrates; but the words that he desired to introduce could be acted upon by the magistrates without any loss of dignity; and he therefore moved, in page 42, line 34, to insert the words—

"And shall not proceed with the enlistment, if he considers the recruit under the influence of liquor."

MR. O'SULLIVAN hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would see his way to accept the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway.

MR. H. SAMUELSON pointed out that many recruits at the time of their enlistment were, although not very drunk, just able to understand what was said to them when they were prompted.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 78 (Power of recruit to purchase discharge).

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME said, he was sorry that the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) was not in his place to bring the weight of his experience to bear upon the points which he (Captain Milne-Home) wished to urge in connection with the Amendments to the clause standing in the names of the hon. and gallant Member and himself. It was not his intention to take the extreme course of moving the rejection of the clause, which had been already discussed and disposed of in Committee; but he could not help feeling that its retention, at all events, in the form in which it then stood, would be detrimental to the Service, and a source of unfairness to many soldiers serving in the Army. He objected to the clause altogether, because it treated of a matter which he considered to be one of Departmental detail that ought to be dealt with by the military authorities. Without wishing to detain the House, he would only place the Amendments before the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, in the hope that he would turn round in his place to say that he agreed to them. He was, however, obliged to remind the House that the clause presented an entirely new principle, and he thought the House should be informed by whom that principle had been recommended; because, if he mistook not, no such recommendation was made by the Committee upstairs. The 21st Article of War provided that a soldier should not be dismissed from the Service without a discharge granted according to General Order, and the Warrant then in force stated that no soldier could demand his discharge as a matter of right. The present clause, however, allowed a soldier of under three months' service to claim his discharge upon the payment of £10. His (Captain Milne-Home's) first Amendment was to leave out the word "three," and insert the word "one," in line 32, page 43, of the Bill. He objected to the period of three months named in the clause upon the score of the expense to the country which it entailed. This was particularly apparent in the case of Cavalry regiments, in which the training of a recruit during a period of three months cost from £20 to £30. If, therefore, the soldier was discharged at the end of three months, the country would thereby be at a loss of £10 to £20; because, on his discharge, he had only to pay the sum of £10 for the use of Her Majesty. The man would leave the Service a much better article, so to speak—well conducted, set up, drilled, and, in short, a very much more marketable commodity in the labour market than he was before he joined it. It must also be recollected that if a man, after three months' service, was discharged, another man would have to be brought in to fill his place who had no service at all. With regard to his second Amendment, he thought that if the clause was to stand in its present form, the commanding officer ought to have something to say with reference to a recruit's leaving at the end of three months, because great inconvenience might result from this, especially if a large number of men claimed their discharge at one time. Under those circumstances, more work would be thrown on their comrades who remained in the regiment; and he, therefore, thought that the men ought not to be allowed to claim their discharge except with the approval of the commanding officer. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving the first of the Amendments of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed, in page 43, line 32, to leave out the word "three," and insert the word "one."—(Captain Milne-Home.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Bill."

COLONEL STANLEY hoped the House would not accept the Amendment. The subject had been discussed at considerable length in Committee, and the present regulations had met with the general approval of the House. His own convictions in the matter were strengthened by the recommendations of a Departmental Committee consisting of very experienced officers.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 83 (Prolongation of service in certain cases).

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 47, line 6, to leave out the word "active."

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 47, line 12, at the end, to insert, as a separate paragraph—

Clause 83 (Prolongation of service in certain cases).

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 47, line 6, to leave out the word "active."

Amendment agreed to; word struck out accordingly.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 47, line 12, at the end, to insert, as a separate paragraph—

"If a soldier required under this section to be discharged or sent to the United Kingdom desires, while a state of war exists between Her Majesty and any foreign power, to continue in

Her Majesty's service, and the competent military authority approve, he may agree to continue as a soldier of the regular forces in the same manner in all respects as if his term of service were still unexpired, except that he may claim his discharge at the end of such state of war, or, if it is so provided by such agreement, at the expiration of any period of three months after he has given notice to his commanding officer of his wish to be discharged."

Amendment agreed to; paragraph inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 84 (In imminent national danger, Her Majesty may continue soldiers in, or require soldiers to re-enter, army service).

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 47, line 18, after "all," to insert "or any."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

COLONEL STANLEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 47, line 26, after the word "enlistment," to insert—

"And the period during which his service may be prolonged under the foregoing provisions of this Act."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 86 (Discharge or transfer to reserve).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 48, line 4, after "Act," to insert "or the Acts relating to the reserved forces." The hon. Gentleman said, in explanation, that that and the following Amendment were for the purpose of enabling a soldier to be continued in the Reserve after having served his time in the Army. Under other Acts, a soldier could be kept in the Reserves when his period of Army service had expired, and the object of the Amendment was to make it clear that he could do so with his consent.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 48, line 6, to add at the end "or, with his assent, transferred to the reserve forces."

Colonel Stanley

Amendment proposed,

"In page 48, line 6, after the word "discharged," to insert the words "or with his assent transferred to the reserve forces."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY thought that those words were useless. Under the Reserved Forces Act, anyone who pleased and was eligible might go into the Reserves. There was no power to transfer a man without his consent.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 90 (Justices of the peace for the purposes of enlistment).

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, that as the hon. and gallant Member for Winchester (Colonel Naghten) was not in his place, he (Mr. Samuelson) would move the Amendment which stood in his name. Militia officers were always subject to military law, and it would be quite impossible for them to act as justices of the peace as the clause stood. To remedy that he would move in page 50, line 42, after the word "Act," to insert "except officers of Militia while the regiments to which they belong are disembodied."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 91 (Enlistment of foreigners and negroes).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved, as an Amendment, in page 51, line 7, to leave out the words "so enlisted." The object of the Amendment was to make it quite clear how far aliens were eligible for the position of commissioned officers in Her Majesty's Service. The clause under notice provided for the enlistment of aliens as soldiers in Her Majesty's Army, and proceeded to enact that aliens so enlisted should not be competent to hold higher rank than that of warrant officer or non-commissioned officer. It seemed hard that after having served a certain period as soldiers, aliens should be incapable of being made officers, unless it were also clear that they were incapable of being made officers if they had not entered the ranks at all. He proposed to omit the words "so enlisted," in order to make it quite clear that no alien should be capable of holding higher rank in Her Majesty's Service than that of warrant or non-commissioned officer. It would, of course, be open to an alien to be naturalized and then to hold a commission, whether he had served in the ranks or not.

Amendment proposed, in page 51, line 7, to leave out the words "so enlisted."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'so enlisted' stand part of the Bill."

MAJOR NOLAN deprecated so strict a line as that proposed being drawn. The suggestion came at an important time; because, if the late Prince Imperial had had a more defined position, he would probably not have been allowed to have entered on the expedition which resulted in his death.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Another Amendment made.

Clause 101 (Liability to provide billets).

MR. O'SULLIVAN moved, as an Amendment, in page 54, line 35, after the word "alehouses," to insert "bakers, butchers, and refreshment house keepers." He hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would have no objection to the insertion of this Amendment. Under the present system of limiting billeting to alehouses and inns, there was often a great want of accommodation. He did not see why the butchers and bakers, and refreshment house keepers, should not be under the same liability to accommodate the troops as the inn-keepers. Many times he had seen great inconvenience result from the accommodation being limited, as it now was, to public-houses. He trusted it would be extended according to the terms of his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 54, line 35, to insert, after the word "alehouses," the words "bakers, butchers, and refreshment house keepers."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CALLAN hoped that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would not yield to the proposal of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan). The butchers and bakers only kept houses for their own accommodation; whereas, by the Acts under which public-houses were licensed in Ireland, they were compelled to provide accommodation for the public. He trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not inflict private soldiers upon the butchers and bakers, but would limit the accommodation, as at present, to licensed houses.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the question of billeting was of some importance. The Bill placed the Irish law of billeting upon the same footing as the English. Formerly, billeting in private houses took place in Ireland. It was not necessary for him to say more than that he could not accept the Amendment. He should be prepared, however, to make arrangements to prevent inconvenience to the troops, if it were brought to the notice of the authorities.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE considered that the convenience of troops on the march was a matter of great importance. At present, much inconvenience was suffered from the troops having to be billeted exclusively in taverns. If the butchers and bakers had the best houses in a town, then he thought that the troops ought to be billeted in them. He hoped the Amendment would be accepted.

MR. ONSLOW pointed out that, by the provisions of the Bill, all persons selling wine, brandy, spirits, strong waters, cider, or metheglin by retail were compellable to give accommodation to the troops. He thought it would be going too far to make the butchers and bakers also take the troops in.

MAJOR NOLAN understood that a new Schedule was to be framed fixing the prices for billeting. It would be absurd to make the butchers and bakers liable to have troops billeted upon them, for their houses were as much private houses as the linendrapers.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 103 (Accommodation and payment on billet).

MAJOR O'BEIRNE moved, as an Amendment, in page 56, line 13, after the word "billets," to insert "and the officer or non-commissioned officer authorisied to demand such billets." The effect of the Amendment was to give an officer or non-commissioned officer a right to reject a billet he did not consider suitable. There were opportunities at present for some innkeepers to escape receiving troops by agreement with the constable, the excuse being given that all the beds in their hotels were engaged. In consequence of that, troops had frequently to be billeted two or three miles away from their place of parade. That had happened at Leicester, Reigate, and other places; and he had known it done, although the innkeepers had plenty of accommodation.

Amendment proposed,

In page 56, line 13, after the word "billets," to insert the words "and the officer or non-commissioned officer authorized to demand such billets."—(Major O'Beirne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY did not think it would be wise to insert these words in the Bill, as they would introduce an entirely new principle. Hitherto, billets had had to be demanded from the civil authorities entitled to issue them, and the matter was entirely in their hands. Moreover, he should not like to leave so large a discretionary power in the hands of the non-commissioned officers. It would be far better to leave the discretion in the hands of the civil officials.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 126 (Arrangements with Indian and colonial governments as to prisons).

MR. PARNELL said, he had to move an Amendment in page 69, to add, at the end thereof—

"And in all cases where the court has so otherwise ordered, returns shall be annually laid before Parliament specifying such sentences, and stating the special reasons for such order in each case."

This Amendment was one which he thought the Government would agree to. It referred to the limitation placed upon sentences of over twelve months' imprisonment inflicted abroad. It had been provided that unless the court otherwise directed the punishment should take place in England. He only wished for

Returns to be laid before Parliament giving the special reasons why courts martial had decided that the imprisonment should take place abroad.

Amendment proposed,

In line 69, to insert, at the end of Clause, the words "and in all cases where the court has so otherwise ordered, Returns shall be annually laid before Parliament specifying such sentences, and stating the special reasons for such order in each case."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had no objection to the proposal in principle. He did not think, however, that it would be desirable to have Returns of all the cases laid before Parliament. If any particular case were required, then a Return in respect of it could be moved for. It would cause a great deal of useless labour and expense to have Returns made in all cases.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 127 (Duty of governor of prison to receive prisoners, deserters, and absentees without leave).

MR. PARNELL moved, as an Amendment, to add at the end of clause—

"And Returns shall be annually laid before Parliament of all proceedings and evidence taken at inquests or other inquiries into the deaths of prisoners."

Amendment proposed,

In page 69, to insert, at the end of Clause, the words "and Returns shall be annually laid before Parliament of all proceedings and evidence taken at inquests or other inquiries into the deaths of prisoners."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS observed, that the evidence and proceedings at inquests on prisoners would be too bulky to be conveniently laid before the House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT did not see why the evidence in these cases should be laid before Parliament more than in other cases. No Returns were required in ordinary cases, and he could see no reason for their being required here. If the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) wished that Parliament should have cognizance of these matters, of course, everyone knew that they could take cognizance of them. Any particular case which might arise could be called attention to; but it would only lead to unnecessary labour and expense to have such Returns as the hon. Member wished.

MR. PARNELL said, that if he were allowed to do so he would amend his Amendment, by striking from it the words, "proceedings and evidence taken at," and it would then read as follows:—

"And Returns shall be annually laid before Parliament of all inquests or other inquiries into the deaths of prisoners."

MR. SPEAKER said, that the Amendment could not be made, unless the House would first allow the hon. Member to withdraw his Amendment, and he could then move the proposed amended Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 69, to insert, at the end of Clause, the words "and Returns shall be annually laid before Parliament of all inquests or other inquiries into the deaths of prisoners."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided: — Ayes 14; Noes 116: Majority 102.—(Div. List, No. 184.)

Clause 128 (Establishment and regulation of military prisons).

MR. PARNELL said, the next clause—128—was a most important one, which involved a question not settled till the Report, for two reasons; first of all, they awaited the decision of the House as regarded the question of corporal punishment; and, secondly, they were waiting for the Report of the Royal Commission which was charged to inquire into the question of prison discipline.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member has no Amendment to move, I shall call upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to move his Amendments.

MR. PARNELL replied, that he proposed to conclude with a Motion in order to put himself in Order. The Report of the Royal Commission had been placed on their Table. He himself objected to flogging in prisons more than to flogging in the Army, because flogging in prisons must be an entirely unnecessary punishment. A man was under complete control. It could not be said that they were then in the presence of the enemy, and that flogging was, therefore, necessary for the preservation of discipline. A man might be punished in a variety of ways, and they had at hand in a prison all kinds of mechanical appliances for the purpose. They could put a man in a dark and solitary cell for seven days, or they could half-starve him on bread and water, or do a number of other things which would reduce him to subjection. The Commission, however, he was sorry to say, had reported in favour of it, though they said it was very seldom used, and so on.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member for Meath that the question raised here is Clause 128.

MR. PARNELL replied, that Clause 128 was the clause he was speaking upon. He was sorry that he would not be able to move an Amendment on the question, because he had to leave for Ireland by the 7 o'clock train. However, he could inform hon. Gentlemen opposite that one of his hon. Friends would take charge of his Amendment. It was really of such an important character that he must ask the House to allow them to discuss this question fairly and fully, when due and proper consideration could be given to it. This was really a question of great importance, and he exceedingly regretted that the decision of the Royal Commission had been against him. He did not believe flogging in prisons to be at all necessary, for they had done without it in Ireland, and if they could do without it there, surely it was unnecessary here. He would not, however, pursue the question then; for at that hour—2.45—it was unfair to ask the House to do so. He would, therefore, request the Chancellor of the Exchequer to concur in the adjournment of the debate, in order that the matter might be fully, calmly, and coolly discussed. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would admit he had not been unfair to the Government, and he had no desire to be unfair to them. He understood there must be a Saturday Sitting, and, therefore, they might surely be allowed to conclude the Bill then. He begged to move that further consideration be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That further Consideration of the Bill, as amended, be now adjourned."—(Mr. Parnell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the general feeling of the Committee was in favour of going on. He was not at all disposed to complain of the conduct which the hon. Member for Meath had pursued in the discussion of this Bill upon Report; but he thought the feeling of the House was decidedly in favour of proceeding until it was finished. Then he hoped they would be allowed to read it a third time, so as finally to conclude their labours upon it. If the House were disposed to do that, it would not be necessary to have a Saturday Sitting. The Commencement Bill would have to be taken on Monday. He thought it would not be so very great an inconvenience to give another hour or two.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT hoped the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would not press the Motion. He must feel it was impossible that the feeling of the House could be changed upon the question of flogging now, even by an adjournment of the debate till Saturday morning.

MR. BIGGAR reminded the House that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised that due opportunity would be given for the discussion of Amendments, and he would ask him whether there could be a proper discussion after the present hour? No Motion for adjournment had been made till after 2.30, and he did appeal to the right hon. Gentleman not to give them the trouble of going to the Division Lobby at such a time.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER would urge his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) not to proceed with his Motion. There could be no doubt that his hon. Friend had been animated by a sincere desire to improve this Bill. He must confess, however, that in the present temper of the House, and after the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he could not expect to add to the very important victories he had already achieved. He, therefore, thought that no end could be gained by protracting this debate any longer. The hon. Member for Meath was going to Ireland to pursue his patriotic labours there, having achieved victories of which any man in the House might be proud. Whatever might be the representations of hon. Members, or the misconceptions of his conduct, these were victories on which he could look back with pride. They had discussed this question of flogging over and over again—they had debated it under almost every conceivable circumstance. Although he was far from saying it would be unreasonable to ask the House to adjourn, and to continue the discussion on another day, he thought they would be wise to be satisfied with the substantial victory achieved, and he would, therefore, appeal to his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. DILLWYN also appealed to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to withdraw his Motion, as the consequence was, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated, it was now, if the Bill were finished that night, unnecessary to have a Morning Sitting next day. He would, therefore, suggest that the Motion should not be pressed to a Division.

MR. CALLAN also appealed to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to withdraw his Motion. If he read the intention of line 21 of the 128th clause aright, he found that the corporal punishment of 25 lashes was an addition to the general power given in military prisons; and they were told, also, that it was necessary for commanders in the field to have this power. ["Order, Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Is the hon. Member referring to Clause 128?

MR. CALLAN replied, that this was a Motion for continuing the debate. He knew from whom these interruptions came, and he was conscious that the spirit which animated the flogging Gentlemen below the Gangway, who were in favour—

MR. SPEAKER: I must invite the hon. Member to address the Chair.

MR. CALLAN said, he was addressing himself to the Chairman, in calling his attention to the spirit which animated a portion of the House, in interrupting him whilst he was making an appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to facilitate the progress of Public Business. He would not condescend to appeal personally, directly or indirectly, to hon. Members who were in favour of flogging; but he would appeal directly to his hon.

Friend (Mr. Parnell), with reference to this Motion, and would ask him not to press it.

MR. PARNELL felt the force of what had been said, and did not think they could do much good in pressing this question any further. The House was really not in a position to discuss the question as it ought to be discussed; while, if they had a Morning Sitting, the House would feel rather injured at being called upon to discuss once more the question of flogging. He would have an opportunity of bringing this forward on the Army Estimates, and he thought he might fairly postpone it till then. He, therefore, should not propose to move any Amendment in Clause 128. He should, indeed, take no further part in this matter, but would renew his opposition to the prison cat on the Irish Estimates before the close of the Session, and deal with it more effectually in that way.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 164 (Persons subject to military law as soldiers).

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT, in moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice, hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would not object to it. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman could hardly contemplate leaving the Bill in its present state, and he really thought he might consent to this Amendment without injuring his position.

Amendment proposed,

In page 94, line 15, to insert, after the word "law," the words "and such persons shall, for purposes of military control and discipline, be subject to such regulations as may be issued from time to time by the general or other officer commanding, though not specified in this Act."
—(Colonel Arbuthnot.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was very sorry, but he could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 177 (Interpretation of terms).

MR. H. SAMUELSON moved, as an Amendment, in page 106, line 21, after "military," to insert "and hostile." He wished to impress upon the Government that something certainly must be done to meet the case of Cyprus. It was certainly not a hostile occupation. It was an occupation, there was no doubt, and it was a place of arms. They were also bound to give it up in case they did certain things which it was not at all likely they would do. At the same time, it was clear that Cyprus was not a Colony, nor part of the Dominions of Her Majesty the Queen. Therefore, something ought to be done to bring Cyprus under the administration of the law.

Amendment proposed,

In page 106, line 21, to insert, after the word "military," the words "and hostile."
(Mr. H. Samuelson.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT supported the Amendment, observing that Cyprus was not a colony, and was not dealt with as such. If they would look at line 38, page 106, it would be seen that a foreign country meant any place not situate in the United Kingdom, the Colonies, or India. By putting in the words "or Cyprus," the clause would be made perfect.

MR. COURTNEY said, by that proposition, no doubt, the case of Cyprus would be met. At present, the clause did not deal with cases where they might be in possession of a country, or part of a country, in which they were not carrying on active operations. They might, for instance, be in occupation of part of Belgium, Portugal, or Denmark, and these cases would not be dealt with at all under the present Bill. He thought the insertion of the words would meet the case very fairly.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, he had no objection to the words suggested; but it seemed to him that the phrase "military occupation" was perfectly well understood. It was an occupation by the military forces as distinct from the civil government, and where there was an occupation by the military forces they ought to have extraordinary powers.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was not a question whether it was a hostile occupation. For instance, supposing they were in occupation of Eastern Roumelia, in time of peace, would they allow a death-penalty to be enforced under such circumstances?

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 92: Majority 82.—(Div. List, No. 185.)

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, he had already explained that he would not move any of his Amendments, if the Government would accept one of them; and if he knew the Government were about to accept this one, he certainly would not have put the Committee to the trouble of division.

Other Amendments made.

Question, "That the Bill, as amended, be reported to the House," put, and agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped he might appeal to the House, for reasons of Public Business, to read the Bill a third time at once.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Colonel Stanley.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT would take that opportunity of hoping that his right hon. and gallant Friend would further consider an Amendment which they were not able to discuss fully—the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson). He (Sir William Harcourt) hoped in "another place" the difference between a military and a hostile occupation would be fully considered. He thought, if his right hon. and gallant Friend would carefully consider the matter, he would come to the same conclusion.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT hoped, if time would allow, that the matter to which he had already called attention twice would also be borne in mind on another occasion.

Question put, and agreed to.

• Bill read the third time, and passed.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE ZULU WAR— LATEST TELEGRAMS.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL asked if the Government had received any fresh intelligence from South Africa?

VISCOUNT BURY, in reply, said, the following telegrams from Major General Hon. H. Clifford to the Secretary of State for the Colonies were received yesterday from St. Vincent:—

“PIETERMARITZBURG, July 3.

“General left here July 1, 7 a.m., for Durnford via Durban, at which place Chelmsford's despatch in answer to Wolseley's orders reached him. General arrived Port Durnford, July 2, but not yet able to land, surf too high. Euphrata, with drafts, arrived Durban to-day; was to have disembarked everything at Port Durnford, but Commodore cannot anchor. No direct news from Chelmsford since 29th June; information given had been anticipated by officers who arrived from his camp and gave news. Newdigate advancing on Ulundi; force of 500 whites, with surplus waggons, in laager, left about 10 miles from Ulundi; expected to be at Ulundi 1st July. Crealock still at Napoleon Hill; ground in front difficult; no roads; transport required; have sent up four sections mule transport, 48 wagons; native carrier corps being formed for transport of Crealock's Division 2,000 strong at first, if found to answer will be increased to 5,000.

“JULY 4, 8 a.m.

“Have not heard that Wolseley has landed at Port Durnford. Chelmsford's message to Wolseley of June 30 says, ‘Five miles from Entanguin, 10 from Umvolosi River; King's messengers have just left with message from me that I must advance to position left bank of river; I do so to-morrow, but will stop hostilities pending negotiations if demands communicated are complied with by July 3; these demands are, that Indunas come with cattle and guns. I have consented to receive 1,000 captured rifles instead of regiment laying down its arms. As my supply will only permit of my remaining here until July 10, it is desirable I should inform you of conditions of peace to be demanded. White man with King states he has 20,000 men; King anxious to fight; Princes not. Where is Crealock's column? If Wolseley lands before 12 this day, which is last moment for telegraphing you by Olympus, you will be informed. English horses have arrived safe at Cape. Wolseley not able land Port Durnford; returns in Shah to Durban to-day; proceeds by land to 1st Division immediately.

“Noon.

“No further news from Chelmsford has reached me; Wolseley not yet arrived at Durban from Port Durnford.

“2.35 p.m.

“No further news has reached me from Chelmsford, or of Wolseley having landed at Durban.”

SLAVERY IN CUBA.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD SELBORNE, who had given Notice to call attention to the question of slavery in Cuba, and to move for—

“Copies of all despatches and papers containing any communications on that subject which have passed between Her Majesty's Government or Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid and the Spanish Government, and which have not already been laid before Parliament;”

said: It may be in the recollection of those of your Lordships who take an interest in the subject of Slavery, that, on the 21st of March last, my noble Friend (Earl Granville) asked the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government were taking any steps with a view to obtain the fulfilment of the assurances which had been given by the Government of Spain as to the total abolition of Slavery in the Spanish Possessions? My noble Friend put no undue pressure upon the Government: he would have been content if he had only learned that something was really being done. But the noble Marquess, after referring to the change which had then lately taken place in the Spanish Ministry, said that it must be remembered that the matter was one entirely of internal regulation, and that, but for the promise which the Spanish Government had volunteered, we should have no right to mention the subject. That answer occasioned both disappointment and surprise — disappointment, because it was very different in its tone from a letter received less than a year before from the Foreign Office by the Anti-Slavery Society, in reply to a Memorial which it had presented; surprise, because it was impossible to reconcile it either with the tenour of the language held by the Predecessors of the present Secretary of State, or with the real facts on which the right of this country to remonstrate with Spain rested. I can only suppose that the noble Marquess had been too much occupied with the affairs of Turkey and other countries, which are still the strongholds of Slavery on the shores of the Mediterranean, to be able to refresh his memory as to what had previously occurred on this subject. That answer makes it necessary for me to remind your Lordships, that the promises of Spain were not volunteered in such a sense as to make them the sole foundation of our right to remonstrate. We have two Treaties with Spain relating to this question, the one entered into in 1817 and the other in 1835. By the Treaty of 1817, in consideration of a sum of £400,000 then paid by this country, Spain entered into a positive and absolute engagement totally to abolish the Slave Trade throughout her Dominions from the end of the year 1820. By the Treaty of 1835, that engagement was solemnly renewed; the Slave Trade was declared, so far as Spain was concerned, to be wholly abolished and illegal; and each of the contracting States then bound itself to co-operate with the other to suppress it, and Spain entered into a very explicit and positive engagement with us to give absolute freedom to all those negroes who might be taken out of vessels which were found carrying on the trade; to insure to those negroes good treatment in every way; and, likewise, to communicate information to us on the subject. In what manner were those engagements fulfilled? They did not, it is true, bind Spain to abolish within her Dominions the institution of Slavery: but they bound her not to add, by any means resulting from the Slave Trade, to the number of the unhappy beings who were already subject to it. It appears from the Returns made from time to time by the British Consul General and Commissioners in Cuba, and laid before Parliament, that in the 20 years between 1822 and 1842, no fewer than 200,621 slaves were introduced into Cuba by ships sailing from, and returning to, Spanish ports. I have not been able to ascertain the exact numbers for the next 16 years; but, during that interval, instead of the trade diminishing, it largely increased, and in the five years from 1858 to 1862, no fewer than 100,560 were likewise imported into Cuba, against the stipulations of the Treaties. The total number imported during the 42 years from 1820 to 1863 could not have been under 500,000. On the 8th of June, 1860, Lord John Russell, speaking in the House of Commons, said—

“I believe from 30,000 to 40,000 slaves are annually brought into that Island from Africa, and it is perfectly true that this trade is carried on in contempt and violation of Treaties between this country and Spain.”—[3 Hansard, cliv. 206.]

In a despatch of September 30th, 1860, Consul General Crawford estimated that the total number of slaves in Cuba was then 400,000, the excess of deaths over births being 8 per cent per annum. Those figures substantially justify his conclusion, in a despatch of March 23rd, 1876, that every able-bodied African then in Cuba under 55 years of age must have been imported clandestinely, and was legally entitled to his freedom at once. Every, or almost every, able-bodied negro in Cuba under 55 years of age was, in 1876, a living monument of the breaches of Treaty committed by Spain, and we had a clear Treaty right to remonstrate against the retention in Slavery of nearly the whole slave population of Cuba at that time. With regard to the negroes who had been intercepted by the Spanish cruisers in slave-trading vessels, called, in the language of the country, Emancipados, and whom the Spanish Government was bound by the Treaty of 1835 to restore to perfect freedom, as well as to insure them the best possible treatment, Consul General Crawford, in his Report of August 28th, 1863, said—

“The Emancipado is the most wretched of human beings, for he is neither more nor less than a Government slave; and he is condemned to drag out a life of hopeless misery, being constantly re-assigned from one master to another at the caprice of the authorities, and being subjected to all the hardest labour and discipline of the slave without any adequate remuneration, and without even the privilege which is accorded to the slave of purchasing his own freedom. The treatment which these poor creatures receive at the hands of their masters is, generally speaking, of the very worst kind. They are cheated out of their wages, and are subjected to every species of punishment. They are sold, or rather they are transferred from one master to another, for a consideration generally amounting to from 170 dollars to 204 dollars; and terrible abuses are committed with the friendless Emancipado, such as reporting him dead, whereas he has been substituted for a defunct slave.”

Thus, both with respect to the continuance of the Slave Trade, and to the treatment of those who were ostensibly rescued from slavery, the Spanish Goverament, for a long course of years, systematically disregarded its direct Treaty engagements. A Convention for better securing the performance of the Treaties was proposed by this country in 1840, and another in 1850; but both were rejected by Spain. These things did not take place without continual remonstrances by the Predecessors in Office of the noble Marquess, who certainly did not take the view that the subject was one which, except by some voluntary concession of the Spanish Government, we were not entitled to mention to them. I will mention a few of the instances which are scattered over the Slave Trade Papers of many years. In 1841, Lord Palmerston urged the Spanish Govern-

"To take steps for restoring to freedom all those negroes who have been introduced into Cuba as slaves in violation of the laws of Spain, and who, therefore, not being the legal property of any man, are ipso facto free by the law of the country itself."

In June, 1870, Lord Clarendon sent to Mr. Layard, for communication to the Spanish Government, a Memorial which he had received from the Anti-Slavery Society, with his answer, in which he stated that—"It was impossible not to acknowledge that the slaves introduced into Cuba, in violation both of the Spanish laws and of the international obligations of Spain towards this country, were properly entitled to their freedom."

And Mr. Layard was then instructed to express a hope that the question would be dealt with in a "complete and satisfactory manner." It was in that year that those promises were made to this country by Spain, which the noble Marquess opposite in March last declared to have been volunteered. While those promises were still recent, the language of my noble Friend behind me, who asked the Question in March last, was very explicit as to the right of this country, founded upon Treaty engagements to be heard upon the subject. In 1871, Mr. Layard wrote that Senor Martos had admitted to him that "pledges had been given to Her Majesty's Government;" to which he had replied, that—

"Her Majesty's Government, after the assurances given them, would have just grounds for remonstrance if something were not done to prove the intention of the Spanish Government to carry out those measures for the eventual total abolition of Slavery, which they had publicly pledged themselves, not only to Spain, but to Europe and the United States, to adopt."

On the 24th of November, 1871, my noble Friend wrote to Mr. Layard—

"Her Majesty's Government do not feel justified in maintaining any longer the silence and reserve which they have hitherto observed upon a question in which they have a Treaty right to interfere;"

referring, at that time, more especially to the case of the Emancipados. In December of the same year, he told the Spanish Ambassador that—

"With us it was not a question of merely making a representation on a matter which we had at heart, but was one, also, of insisting on the execution of positive Treaty engagements."

If the noble Marquess opposite had remembered the terms of those communications, when he answered the Question addressed to him on the 21st of March last, he would hardly have replied that it was a matter entirely of internal regulation, and that but for the promises volunteered we should have no right to mention the subject. I wish the House now to consider what has been done, to make reparation for the long-continued breach of Treaty engagements in this matter, and also what steps have been taken to fulfil those promises, which were really not volunteered, but resulted from a frank recognition by the Spanish Government of our right to be heard upon this subject. The facts are these. The Slave Trade went on constantly increasing till about 1862, but afterwards diminished; and within a few years of that time, before the commencement of the Cuban insurrection in 1869, it had come entirely to an end. That, no doubt, was a great gain; but those who had, down to that time, been illegally reduced into servitude, were still deprived of their freedom. During the insurrection, the insurgents proclaimed the total and immediate abolition of Slavery wherever their power extended, and the question became complicated with the difficulties arising out of that insurrection. In 1870 a declaration was made in the Cortes that the Spanish Government had at last determined to put an end to Slavery. General Prim requested the British Minister at Madrid to communicate that declaration to Her Majesty's Government, with an assurance of their sincere intention to carry it into effect. In the same summer a law was proposed by Senor Moret, and passed the Cortes, upon the subject; but it was very far from carrying out the declaration; it only provided for the liberation of slave children born subsequent to the promulgation of the law after they should have undergone a period of forced service, absolutely undistinguishable from slavery, till they were 18 years of age, and very little better till they were 22; and for the emancipation of slaves above 60 years of age. It also declared that the Emancipados should be put into full possession of the rights of freemen; but it left the execution of that provision to local boards. Mr. Layard was, however, requested to communicate assurances that this measure would be followed by others providing for the complete abolition of Slavery. Six years afterwards, Mr. Consul Crawford said that the practical working of that Act would be

“To maintain slavery, not for 22 years, as some persons suppose, but for an indefinite period. In fact,” he continued, “it is the Emancipado system revived on a sweeping scale. The traffic in Emancipados still continues.”

Now, so far as Cuba is concerned, this is the last step that has been taken. Nothing has been done for Cuba in the nine years since the passing of that most imperfect law. A debate occurred upon the subject in the House of Commons in 1872, and an Address to the Crown was proposed; but as the answer given by the Government of that day justified the expectation that they would lose no favourable opportunity of moving in the matter, a Division was not then taken. Since that time, I am happy to say, one step has been taken by Spain in the right direction, though not in Cuba. The slaves in Porto Rico were emancipated in March, 1873. I mention this with great satisfaction, as it shows that there are statesmen in Spain who are perfectly sincere in their desire to fulfil the promises which have been made. I have every reason to believe that this great step has been successful, and is found to have inflicted no practical injury upon the Colony. The obstacles which existed in Cuba during the time of the insurrection have been removed long enough to entitle us to ask that no more time should be lost in the complete accomplishment, there also, of this great object. It is now considerably more than a year since the insurrection has been suppressed, and nine years since the original assurances were given by General Prim and Senor Moret. I can assure your Lordships that it is from no want of friendly feeling towards Spain that I now bring this question forward; on the contrary, I am fully convinced that those who desire to persuade Her Majesty's Government to bestir themselves in this matter are among the best friends of Spain. There is not one of your Lordships, I am sure, who does not desire that we should be on the best terms with Spain, who has not felt sympathy with her in the manifold troubles and difficulties through which she has passed, who does not rejoice in the happier prospects which seem to be now before her, or who would not be inclined to condone the great forbearance which the British Government has manifested. I have a right to call it forbearance; remembering, as all your Lordships must remember, the very different course taken by this country with Brazil, a nation bound to us, on the subject of Slavery, by obligations not more stringent than those of Spain—remembering, also, what the result of the course so taken with Brazil has been. I cannot, however, and I do not, regret that our attitude towards Spain has been uniformly friendly, forbearing, and considerate. But for the sake of Spain herself, and for the credit of this country, there ought to be some limit to inactivity and silence. The influence of the British Government is very great; it cannot be used in a better cause. Cuba is now in a state of comparative tranquillity; but it is impossible to expect that the present state of things in that Island can long continue undisturbed, if the promises so solemnly given for the complete restoration of its coloured population to that freedom which is really their right should very much longer remain unfulfilled. The true interest of Spain, in Cuba itself, requires the fulfilment of those promises. And not her interest only, but her honour. It is surely for the honour of Spain not to be the last nation to fulfil the great work of emancipation. One by one other countries have put down, first the Slave Trade, and then Slavery—first England, then the United States, then Portugal. Spain is the only civilized nation now left in Europe—for Turkey is essentially an Oriental Power—which has not wiped off from her escutcheon that foul stain. It is now for her, I trust at a time not far distant, to put the finishing stroke to this great work, and to crown, by the emancipation of the negro population in Cuba, this great series of the triumphs of liberty.

Moved, That there be laid before the House—

“Copies of all despatches and papers containing any communications on that subject which have passed between Her Majesty’s Government or Her Majesty’s Minister at Madrid and the Spanish Government, and which have not already been laid before Parliament.”—(The Lord Selborne.)
